Mr. Barnes: My point is that the quality of Northern Ireland debates and our understanding of its problems would benefit from the participation of many more hon. Members in our late night debates. If more hon. Members discussed economic and social developments in Northern Ireland and the daily bread-and-butter issues of Northern Ireland politics, we might be able to make a significant contribution towards the solution of the problems there. The House is full only when a dramatic terrorist outrage is being discussed. There is great concern about student loans because so many working class people and women in Northern Ireland take advantage of education. Their increased participation ought to be welcomed.

When the amendments were moved by the Minister, he did not refer to Lords amendment No. 6. It was a general introduction. Nevertheless, this is an amendment that deals specifically with Northern Ireland. Clause 4(4) refers to the fact that, apart from subsection (2), the Bill will not extend to Northern Ireland. Subsection (2) refers to the fact that Northern Ireland will not be allowed to use the affirmative resolution procedure, which would automatically lead to an hour and half debate. Only the negative resolution procedure will be allowed. It would therefore have to be forced on to the agenda, presumably by Northern Ireland Members of Parliament, if they so wished.

The Government intend to stick the student loans provision on to Northern Ireland. They said that a further debate on Northern Ireland matters would not be needed because Northern Ireland was already covered by the earlier measure. So quite a strange arrangement exists which just assumes that when a particular piece of legislation is passed it will go for Northern Ireland as well, although Northern Ireland is specifically excluded from the coverage of the Bill.

It is an unfortunate arrangement. Apart from the problems of not being allowed in the House to amend resolutions and orders on Northern Ireland, if there are to be certain areas that are just ruled out because it has already been assumed that the decisions coming from the Department of Education and Science on this occasion are exact replicas of what has been produced before, we will be in a strange procedural position as regards Northern Ireland. That is not unusual on this Bill.

[Mr. Barnes]

When the amendment is added to the subsection that I read out earlier, it would read:

> "Except for section 2 and, as respects institutions in Northern Ireland, the power to make regulations under paragraph 2 of schedule 2, this Act does not extend to Northern Ireland."

So there is to be another bit that is to extend to Northern Ireland.

As I understand it, and as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) outlined it, the problem was that it had not been realised that many students from Northern Ireland studying in another part of the United Kingdom would require student loans under these provisions and were not being catered for by the legislation. Someone had missed this out. It had been overlooked, despite the fact that we had had no timetable provision. We had gradual development through Committee and full debate and discussion in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading, and still it had not been discovered that Northern Ireland was not included. It should not have been for Opposition Members to produce an amendment on this.

Quite a good arrangement could exist whereby, if Northern Ireland students in Northern Ireland, perhaps temporarily, were not operating under this law but under grant provision, those who came to England, Wales and Scotland to study should maintain their grants under it as well.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Does the hon. Member agree that it is a matter of regret that parents who pay full rates at the level deemed appropriate in Northern Ireland are adversely treated when their children attend universities on the mainland and, in addition, are now required to pay poll tax?

Mr. Barnes: A very strange situation exists with regard to poll tax. We are talking about operations equivalent to local education authorities and their provision of grants and now also the operation of loans. We have a different system of funding local government, or the equivalent of local government, provisions that exist in Northern Ireland and in the rest of the United Kingdom. It may be that the Government will discover as they go along, if they are not going to give the advantages, as they see them, of the community charge to Northern Ireland, that they are in some kind of inconsistency. They may, therefore, not want to introduce exactly the same provisions for Northern Ireland students going to Northern Ireland universities as they are now placing on other Northern Ireland students attending universities in the rest of the United Kingdom. They could yet be in a constitutional conundrum.

What I strongly object to is the assumption that a measure to be brought before us on some future occasion will be an exact replica of the measure now in front of us and that therefore other amendments have to be made in order to fit in with the legislation at this stage, so that the whole thing will work together within some general pattern. There is something nonsensical in the way in which we deal with Northern Ireland measures, which I referred to on earlier amendments, when there was a possibility that we could have had in front of us a procedure for student loans where proposals put before us would not just be dealt with by affirmative resolutions but could be amended by us. There would be some sense in that being added to Northern Ireland legislation, and perhaps a useful start could be made with regard to student loans.

Mr. Jackson: May I first join the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) in welcoming the presence in the debate of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson). The whole House knows of his great interest in these matters. If I may take this opportunity, I would like to say how much I appreciate the support that he has given to our proposals.

Mr. Straw: I wonder if the Under-Secretary is trying to invite the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West to ensure that he is borne in mind under a Heseltine administration.

Mr. Jackson: I would not dream of allowing such considerations to enter my mind.

I was amused by the hon. Member for Blackburn's hair-splitting about the difference between principles and principals. It reminded me of the old crack about the collective noun for a collection of vice-chancellors being a lack of principals. The hon. Gentleman referred to the principle of loans, but the vice-chancellors are on common ground with the Government in affirming that graduates should make payments in respect of their maintenance over and beyond their normal tax obligations. We are all agreed—and Opposition spokesmen in another place were agreed—on the fundamental principle of the anticipation by students of some of their future earnings as graduates.

Northern Ireland has been the subject of some misconception during the debate in the remarks of the hon. Members for Blackburn and for Southwark and Bermondsey, the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes). Amendment No. 6 does not introduce the loans scheme into Northern Ireland as has been implied; it is purely and simply a consequential amendment which flows from the other amendments, but that is not what appeared to be understood by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East.

Amendment No. 6 is consequential on the other amendments which introduce various conditions in relation to institutions. We are requiring Northern Ireland institutions to certify institutions originating from Great Britain. As the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said, that is a logical implication of the votes in both Houses to include students at Northern Ireland institutions within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. Harry Barnes: If I have not understood what was being said, perhaps the Minister can explain a bit more clearly. I was arguing that if people from Northern Ireland study in England, Scotland or Wales, some institutional arrangements are needed in the same way as for other students. Is that the case?

Mr. Jackson: Having served with the hon. Gentleman on the Standing Committee, I am afraid that he tempts me to say that I am not sure that he would benefit from an explanation.

I noted the rather discouraging remarks from the hon. Member for Blackburn about the idea of incentive regimes. The hon. Gentleman should start to learn about such ideas. I understood that it was Labour party policy now to be converted to the idea of market economics. When he investigates that idea, he will find that the concept of income incentive regimes is a natural one.

Mr. Andrew Smith: While we are learning about incentive regimes, if the Minister thinks that it is worthwhile to pay £3·50 to institutions for every correctly completed certification form, how much will he pay institutions for each completed application for access funds and for the processing of those access funds, which will cost a great deal more than certifying students for eligibility loans?

Mr. Jackson: There were many occasions on which the Standing Committee went into seminar mode, but the House would not thank me for doing that now, because we want to press on with the amendments.

Mr. Straw: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jackson: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

I noticed that neither the hon. Member for Blackburn nor the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, with whom it is always such a pleasure to debate, gave any ground for dissenting from our assessment of £3·50 per student account as an appropriate sum. The hon. Member for Blackburn also confirmed that the Government are consulting the institutions. In the circumstances, I construe that as an admission that the amendment is unnecessary and I recommend accordingly that the House rejects it.

Mr. Straw: I should like briefly to refer to our amendment to Lords amendment No. 11. If hon. Members were in any doubt about the need to write into the Bill a requirement for the Government first to consult and then to pay full compensation for operating the ramshackle scheme, those doubts would be allayed entirely by the complete failure of the Minister to answer a simple and direct question from my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). I am not allowed to refer to the officials in the Box, but if the Under-Secretary looks to his left he will notice that someone is scribbling an answer to be passed to him. If he wishes to intervene, I shall allow him to read the answer.

Mr. Jackson: I did not answer the question because I am interested in making progress. The question related to a matter that is not the subject of any amendment before us.

Mr. Straw: The Under-Secretary is wrong. The matter relates to Lords amendment No. 11 and to amendment (a) to that amendment. The regulations will require the institutions to administer a scheme to which they object. Amendment (a) provides that there should be full consultation and compensation before the regulations come into force. The Under-Secretary showed that he has not even thought about the need for compensation in respect of one important aspect of the operation of the Government's new policies on student maintenance—the access funds. How will the universities and colleges be compensated for operating those funds?

Mr. Jackson: Of course the Government have thought about the point. Lords amendment No. 11 does not refer to consultation or to compensation for work connected with the access funds.

Mr. Straw: Amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 11 refers to consultation on and compensation for operating the student loan scheme. Throughout all the debates, the Government have endlessly sought to provide a fig leaf for their indignity and embarrassment about the scheme by referring to the loans scheme. The Under-Secretary cannot have it both ways—parading the access funds when it suits him, but when it does not, pretending that they are not part of the scheme. The only justification that he has been able to give for the removal of housing benefit, which we do not accept, is the existence of some measly access funds, which will barely compensate for the loss of housing benefit at even one university.

I hope that the House will reject Lords amendment No. 6.

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:

Schedule 2

LOANS FOR STUDENTS

Lords amendment: No. 7, in page 3, line 40, at end insert—

"(1A) The maximum amount prescribed under sub-paragraph (1)(a) above for the loan to be made to a student in any year shall not exceed—

(a) the amount specified as the ordinary maintenance requirement for students of the class of description to which he belongs by regulations having effect for that year under section 1(1) of the Education Act 1962 (mandatory awards); or

(b) if no such amount is specified for students of the class or description to which he belongs, such amount as the Secretary of State considers appropriate for students of that class or description having regard to the amount specified as mentioned in paragraph (a) above;

but regulations, other than the first, made under sub-paragraph (1)(a) above may prescribe a higher maximum if a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament."

Read a Second time.

Mr. Andrew Smith: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, amendment (a), leave out lines 13 to 16.

With four debates to get through in one hour and 13 minutes, under the draconian guillotine procedure, I shall be brief.

Lords amendment No. 7 concedes that which the Government would not concede in Committee or in the House previously, that incorporated in the legislation should be the requirement that the loan amount should not exceed the operative amount of grant, thereby setting the 50:50 parity between loan and grant.

So far, so good. The bad aspect of the Lords amendment is contained in the lines which our amendment proposes to delete, which state that a higher maximum may be prescribed if a draft of the regulations is "laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament."

That contradicts the concession given in the Lords by saying, albeit through affirmative resolution procedure, that the proportion of the loan could be increased. That is important, because we have always protested that the Government intend not merely to have a top-up loan scheme, but a loan scheme which supplements, and then supplants, grants.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) gave the game away in the debate on the guillotine motion—— Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: She is very unrepresentative.

9.30 pm

Mr. Smith: She is about as unrepresentative as the right-wing lunatics who have been advising the Government all the way through this steady march towards education depending on ability to pay rather than ability to benefit.

It is because we believe that the ability to benefit should be the criterion for access to higher education that we wanted the Government to accept the full spirit and wording of the amendments initiated by our noble Friends in the Lords, and it is why we wish that they had not added in this opportunity for a higher proportion of loan to be brought in by secondary legislation under the affirmative procedure.

If this top-up loan scheme is truly a scheme, as the Government have said, based on parity between loans and grant, they should be prepared to accept that definition in the primary legislation and recognise that further primary legislation would be necessary to change it. By conceding only what they have conceded, the Government have given away their real intention to go further down this slippery slope and make access to higher education depend on ability to pay. That is wholly unacceptable to us and to most of the public.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The only comment I want to make about the sedentary disclaimer about the views of the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and their representatives of the Tory party is that Conservative politicians who represent Essex constituencies always seem to be the most hard-line brand of Toryism personified. If anyone wants to hear liberal views about education I suggest he stays away from the boundaries of Essex. I do not know what the poor people of Essex have done to deserve such a collection of right wingers as they enjoy now and have enjoyed in the past——

Mr. Pawsey: And they have huge majorities.

Mr. Hughes: Sadly, as the hon. Gentleman says, some of them do. As the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) reminded us, they include among their number another candidate for the Tory party succession—the right hon. member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit).

I support the Opposition amendment. The Lords amendment was passed because the Government would not concede the principle that, when the regulation was drafted, it would not allow loans to go up beyond 50 per cent. There is so much opposition to the principle that loans should exist at all, let alone that they should go up to 50 per cent. of total funding for students, that it would have been enough to hold the line at that. The consensus in another place was that, if it was Government policy to change the system of fully funded student grants so that only half of students' funding came from grants, that should at least be written into the Bill. It would have been preferable if the last lines of the Lords amendment had been amended to take account of that.

One of the great concerns that has not been allayed throughout all our deliberations is the fear that, if students are required to decide to go on to higher education but to borrow to fund it, that in itself will prove a disincentive; and the greater the borrowing, the more of a disincentive it will prove.

If the Government argue that applications this year are up, as they are, those who do not believe that loans will be a disincentive should remember that that increase is on the basis of a grant system and that, even if there is only a small, although noticeable, effect on the scheme at the beginning, it could become more damaging the higher the percentage of money loaned in relation to the grant.

No member of the Committee, including Ministers, could discover one country that has gone from a grant system to a grant and loan system. Therefore, there is no precedent for the argument that a loan system, even in part, would not be a disincentive. If our argument that it will be a disincentive proves wrong, we shall admit it, but Ministers should not take the risk. That is why the proposal is flawed.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): As my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said, it is strange that the Government should accept the need to write into the Bill that, in the fulness of time, the 50:50 parity proposal will come into being, yet in the same amendment provide to allow that to be changed without going through the process of primary legislation.

We are talking about a significant number of students who would be affected if the legislation were in place today. I elicited from the Department of Education and Science the fact that almost 40 per cent. of all students currently studying received the full mandatory award. Some 151,000 students in universities, polytechnics and other higher education institutions will be dramatically affected by the proposal.

Mr. Jackson: They will have more money.

Mr. Griffiths: Some will have more money, but they will have to pay the money back. Moreover, the Minister and his colleagues have consistently refused to tell us how many students currently receive housing benefit of more than £420 a year, as the loan is planned to be in the first year, and the £310 it is planned to be in the last year. They have refused to give that information, because the likelihood is that thousands upon thousands of students will be worse off.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The hon. Gentleman says that students will have to pay back the loans, but he omitted to mention that they will not have to pay back anything until they are earning £11,500, which, compared with the income of some of those who will be contributing to their education, is a substantial income.

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Lady is leading me down a path which is not covered by the amendment. However, anyone who chooses to study for a degree, given that they have reasonable qualifications at GCSE and A-level, will have already sacrificed earnings in excess of £50,000 at current rates by the time that they receive their degree. That is the sum that they could have earned by taking a job at 16 or 18. In British Steel, British Gas, Marks and Spencer plc, W. H. Smith and Son, Ltd. or local government, between 16 and 22 an employee would have earned over £50,000. Therefore, people studying at university will experience a loss in real income because they will lose the full grant.

With the passing of time, the grant will have only 50 per cent. of its value, and the rest will be made up by a loan which they will be expected to pay back. That is an additional burden which students have not had. Given the fact that the Government will place an additional burden on students when they go into employment after university——

Mr. Pawsey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. His courtesy is always appreciated; I mean that sincerely. Does he not accept that the global value of social security payments in one form or another is about £68 million, whereas the total value of the loan is about £200 million? Therefore, students will receive a substantial additional amount in resources. While I acknowledge the fact that some students will be worse off, we have the access funds. As we have heard from my right hon. Friend, £20 million will be available to help students who are in difficulty because of the loss of housing benefit. Students will be much better off in real terms because of the amount of resources being made available to them, so the hon. Gentleman's argument is threadbare.

Mr. Griffiths: The trouble with the hon. Gentleman's point is that, at the moment, it is all hypothetical. We do not know exactly how students will be affected. We do not know how many students who currently receive the full mandatory award will be deemed to be eligible for money from access funds, nor do we know how much they will get, or what the difference will be between the mandatory award which a student currently receives, plus payments like housing benefit, and what he will get in future. The Government cannnot even tell me how many students will be worse off——

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman is not denying the figures.

Mr. Griffiths: I am not denying any figures. All I am saying is that it amazes me that a Conservative Member can talk with such confidence about the number who will be better off because of the increase in access funds, given that over 150,000 students receive the full mandatory award, when the Government cannot tell us how many students will be adversely affected by the introduction of the loan scheme and the loss of housing and other benefits.

The lack of information gives us no confidence in what the Government are trying to do. It is an experiment for a large part of the population on whom we will depend for our well-being and our success in world markets. I am surprised in one way that the Government insist on including in the amendment the ability to vary the figure later without primary legislation. In one sense it astonishes me; on the other hand, when I remember that, previously in his ministerial career, the Secretary of State was in the Treasury, it does not surprise me.

In the White Paper, there was a wonderful catalogue of tables based upon an inflation rate of 3 per cent. into the next century. We remember too that all the calculations were done on the basis of a student population which did not alter. Given all that, we wonder why this provision is in the Bill. It can only be to make it easy to vary the amount later.

It is as though, last June or July, at a private meeting between Treasury and Education Department officials, the Treasury said, "The scheme is costing much more than the Department ever thought, and the Treasury cannot really afford it. You will have to cut, and the only way of doing that is by increasing the size of the loan, and thereby get more money back from the students as soon as their course is finished."

Mr. Beggs: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the country as a whole has a serious problem with growing debt, and that we should as a matter of principle oppose encouraging young people to incur debt for any reason?

9.45 pm

Mr. Griffiths: I entirely agree. Given that the Prime Minister herself has said so much about how bad it is for people to get into debt, it is surprising that she now encourages them to do so.

That part of amendment No. 7 that allows the Government to vary the limit without recourse to primary legislation must have the purpose of allowing the Government to reduce the grant, increase the loan and cut costs—which are already running headlong out of control.

I hope that the Government will have the good grace —I know it is late, and that everyone wants to go home —to withdraw the amendment. The Under-Secretary has a gentle smile on his face, and I hope that it is one of agreement.

Mr. Jackson: I hope that I may be allowed to chide the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths). He made an excellent contribution in Committee, becoming very involved in all the debates, but he seems to have forgotten about annex D to the White Paper. If he studies that annex, he will find that his arguments about income forgone are completely refuted. At one stage, it seemed as though the hon. Gentleman had learnt that White Paper off by heart. That was a noble exercise on his part. If he will return to it, he will see that his point is met.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Is that the same annex that suggests that there will be no increase in student numbers past the year 2000?

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) is mixing up his annexes. Annex D presents economic analysis of the difference between personal and social rates of return from higher education.

The Government amendment places on the face of the Bill the provision that a student's maximum loan facility should not exceed his or her maximum grant. It is similar to a probing amendment tabled in Committee by the hon. Members for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), Oxford, East and Manchester, Blakeley (Mr. Eastham), so I inferred that it would be generally acceptable. In any event, the Government have always made it clear that, when the loans scheme reaches maturity, the value of the loans and the grant will be broadly equal.

We recognise the concern expressed in another place that statutory provision is required to lend weight to the Government's intentions. We have produced an amendment that meets that concern and retains sufficient flexibility to allow future Governments to respond to changing circumstances without fresh primary legislation. If one assumes an inflation rate of 3 per cent. between now and then, that point will not be reached until 2007. If inflation reaches 6 per cent., that point will be reached a couple of years earlier. We shall not reach the 50:50 stage until a long time ahead—several Governments away from the present Government. In fact, we may get to it at about the time of the first Smith Administration—by which I mean, of course, the Andrew Smith Administration.

The amendment allows the loan and grant balance to be altered beyond the 50:50 ratio, but only subject to explicit parliamentary approval. The loan regulations, which would otherwise require the negative resolution procedure beyond the scheme's first year, would be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure if they were to involve a loan facility exceeding the value of the grant. That, we believe, would allow that first Andrew Smith Administration the flexibility to build on the success of our student loans scheme if it was felt appropriate to do so, but to do so in line with proper parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Mike Watson (Glasgow, Central): Does the Minister accept that, if the scenario that he is suggesting comes to pass and the loan accounts for more than 50 per cent. of maintenance, the Government will effectively have misled the House and the general public by calling the scheme top-up loans for students? They will not be top-up loans, because they will be more than 50 per cent. He cannot have his cake and eat it.

Mr. Jackson: I refuse to join the hon. Gentleman in speculating about this long-distant horizon. I believe that the scheme will be a great success and that it will be possible for that Smith Administration, in perhaps the middle of the first decade of the next century, to consider how to take the matter further forward.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Are the Government ever surprised when people accuse them of wanting to do things that they pretend they do not want to do—in other words, of having a hidden agenda? It is not surprising that people do not believe the Government when they say that loans will be only 50 per cent., and then write into the legislation a provision saying that they can be more than 50 per cent. Why do Governments bite off more than they can chew and always ask not just for the cake but for something in addition?

Mr. Jackson: I am not surprised. After all, Opposition Members are ingenious in finding hidden agendas, even if they have to invent them. The electorate are more sensible and see through such contentions. They saw through them at the last three general elections, and they will do so again.

The Labour amendment to the amendment would remove the element of flexibility which we wish to leave in place for the benefit of the Smith Administration by requiring primary legislation before the loan facility could exceed the grant value. We think that that would be a waste of parliamentary time. We are thinking about the situation down the track. The affirmative resolution procedure is, we believe, sufficient and ensures that the regulations that would be found unsatisfactory by either House could be voted down.

Question put and negatived.

Lords amendment No. 7 agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Because, for reasons given at the start of the debate, Lords amendment No. 8 imposes a charge on the public revenue not authorised by a resolution of the House, under paragraph 3 of Standing Order No. 76, the Lords amendment is deemed to be disagreed with.

Lords amendment: No. 9 in page 4, line 10, at end insert—

"(4) Regulations made under this paragraph shall allow special conditions to be set in respect of repayment of loans for disabled students or graduates."

Read a Second time.

Amendment proposed to the Lords amendment, amendment (b) at end insert

'taking into account the loss of social security benefits to deaf students whilst eligible for loans'.—[Mr. Andrew Smith.]

Mr. Speaker: It will be convenient at the same time to discuss amendment (c) to the Lords amendment, at end insert

', and shall be subject to approval of both Houses of Parliament'.

Government amendment in lieu of the Lords amendment, in page 3, line 40, at end insert—

'(1B) Regulations under sub-paragraph (1)(b) above shall make such separate provision as the Secretary of State considers appropriate with respect to the repayment of loans by borrowers who are disabled.'.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The Opposition amendments are designed to strengthen the Lords amendment, not least in respect of some of the most needful of students who are deaf. I congratulate the other place on its achievement in carrying out the intentions of the amendment to which I spoke for the Opposition on Report in the House of Commons.

In this House, the Minister expressed sympathy and gave a half-promise of eventual support. The Lords were no more content with ministerial statements than my hon. Friends and I were here, but they were able to vouchsafe the interests of disabled students in the Division Lobby.

I know that Baroness Darcy de Knayth and Lord Henderson of Brompton were especially instrumental in winning the day and I thank them, as well as my noble Friends in the other place, for both the humanity of their concern and the success of their advocacy.

One financial consequence of disability is the reduced earning power of many disabled graduates, compared with their non-disabled colleagues. In some cases, disabled graduates will remain unemployed and will be unable to repay a loan. Others will earn less and may be burdened by a loan for longer than their non-disabled colleagues. Sadly, all too many disabled graduates fail to find work or succeed in finding only low-paid employment.

The report on disability in Great Britain from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys shows that only 31 per cent. of all disabled adults of working age are actually working. That compares with 69 per cent. of the population as a whole. The ratio for men is even worse —33 per cent. compared with 78 per cent. Those findings shout the need for the action taken by the other place.

The Government's own record, in terms of jobs offered to people with disabilities, is among the worst of all employers. How many registered disabled people does the Department of Education and Science employ? Again, is the Secretary of State aware that the earnings of disabled people who find work, in whatever employment, are substantially lower than those of non-disabled employees? Even many disabled people in better financial circumstances have to spend all their disposable income on the extra costs arising from their disability.

The Government tend to dismiss the claims of organisations of and for disabled people about the extra costs of disabled living. Yet there are right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who know, from close contacts with their disabled constituents, that the Government's own estimates of the extra costs of disabled living do not match the real costs of disabled people. The fact is that they find it extremely difficult to make ends meet. It may well be that a disabled person will never be able to repay a loan because of the generally lower earnings of disabled graduates. If their earnings are never likely to exceed the 85 per cent. threshold, it is not fair to expect them to have an increasing debt, in cash terms, held against them until it is cancelled when they reach the age of 50 or 60.

There is another important matter that I must raise in the debate. It concerns the Government's intentions in regard to young people who have become disabled after they graduate. How does the Minister intend to approach their problems? Are they to be pursued for the repayment of loans? I have been approached by a number of organisations whose members are deeply concerned about the Government's intentions in regard to people who become disabled after they leave places of higher education. I hope that the Secretary of State, in his reply, will state clearly the Government's intentions as they affect such people. They will suffer the same difficulties, in terms of employment, as other disabled people. They will have the same financial problems. What assurance can the Minister give about the problems that they face?

Time is strictly limited, due to the guillotine. I ask the Secretary of State to appreciate that there is still some uncertainty about his intentions about disabled students. They are looking tonight for a reassuring ministerial statement. I press the Secretary of State to respond positively to their concerns.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): When the Bill was in Committee, both I and other hon. Members moved a series of amendments relating to disabled students. I listened with great care to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). I disagree with his suggestion that the Government did not listen to the views of those who represent disabled people. The Minister with responsibility for higher education was at pains to speak to those who put forward the case on behalf of disabled students, in particular deaf students, and suggested that further consideration would be given, either in the other place or at another stage, to the points that they had made.

I have made a note of several things that have been done since the Committee, which have given effect to those promises. First, the disabled are now specifically recognised in the Bill. That is provided for in Government amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 9. Secondly, we asked that the access funds should be increased. We recognised that disabled students might want to have access to those funds for their own purposes. A recent announcement has boosted the access funds. That will help disabled students. Thirdly, on 19 March 1990 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a number of announcements about increases for disabled students. The basic disabled students allowance is to be increased by 30 per cent. in 1990-91.

In addition, another £3,000 will be made available for specialist equipment and £4,000 will be made available for non-medical helpers. That is a direct result of the pressure applied by the Royal National Institute for the Deaf, to which I pay tribute for the care and concern with which it presented its case on behalf of disabled students. The Government also responded to the representations that were made by hon. Members on both sides in Committee, on this difficult and sensitive subject.

We were deeply impressed by the case put to us by deaf students about the difficulties that they face when they enter higher education. They have to overcome considerable hurdles. Those difficulties are not faced by other students. Deaf students also experience difficulties while going through higher education because of the equipment and non-medical assistance that they need, such as interpreters. I believe that the Government have listened to their case. I very much welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement.

Mr. Alfred Morris: I did not say that the Government refused to listen to the organisations representing disabled people. However, they have refused to respond to their concerns. The Lords amendments were carried in spite of, not because of, Ministers' attitudes. I hope that tonight there will be a statement which will reassure those organisations. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman joins me in making that request to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Burt: I go part of the way with the right hon. Gentleman, but I still hold that the Government's response was a little more genuine than he is prepared to concede. The Government's response in the other place showed that more clearly than the right hon. Gentleman has suggested.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): My hon. Friend may recall that, on Report, I tabled amendments to help disabled students throughout their period of study and during the repayment period. The Minister with responsibility for higher education accepted the purpose of the amendments and gave an assurance that he would take the necessary steps when the Bill was considered in the other place.

Mr. Burt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will comment on that when he speaks.

I understand that draft regulations relating to disabled students' social security entitlement are presently being considered by the Social Security Advisory Committee. That gives us a further opportunity to press our case on behalf of disabled students. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will want to do so.

I should like to thank my right hon. Friend for the attention that he has given to this particularly sensitive matter. Perhaps he has not given us everything that we should have liked, but the Government have moved a long way from the Bill's starting point, when rather too little consideration seemed to be given to the needs of deaf and disabled students. These concerns were raised in Committee, however, and my senior colleagues have listened, and I believe that the Bill will provide the reassurance that the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe genuinely requests. I hope that he will be reassured when my right hon. Friend comes to answer.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Like others who have spoken on this group of amendments, I intend to be brief because, like the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam), I have spoken previously on the needs of disabled students, not in Committee because I was not a member of the Committee, but as far back as 20 October when we discussed the White Paper, and on Report in the House.

In welcoming the announcements made by the Government, we must all pay tribute to the strength of feeling on both sides of the House and to the work of the organisations based outwith the House, which so effectively represent the needs of disabled people everywhere.

If certain hon. Members tend to sound grudging, it is perhaps because many of us would have expected the Government automatically to give consideration to those students in the initial drafting of the Bill. It is sad that we have had to get over so many hurdles to ensure that those genuine needs are recognised.

I have some brief questions to put to the Secretary of State, which I hope that he will be able to answer, particularly in view of the fact that we have not yet had detailed statements of the exact workings of the figures that have been announced. Can he tell us exactly how the funds will be administered? There is an important issue at stake. In Scotland, for example, will the regional education authorities, along with the Scottish Education Department, be involved in deciding how the funds are administered and how disabled students will have access to the extra money? It is not clear whether there will be a cash limit on the amount made available to disabled students. How will the priorities be decided? Who will take those decisions? That is vital to our students, because disability comes in many forms and requires different attitudes and treatment.

I should like again to refer to housing benefit as it affects some of our disabled students. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we have been unable to discuss amendments Nos. 8 and 10, which relate specifically to this issue, because of privilege. However, it has been pointed out, both in the other place and in letters that many of us have received from the Royal National Institute for the Deaf, that, while housing benefit has been defined as continuing to be available to some disabled students, it will certainly not be available to all. A large number of disabled people who are not eligible for disability premium or severe disability premium will therefore not be eligible for housing benefit; yet housing benefit could be of key importance to disabled students in helping them to enter higher education or to continue their studies. Can the Minister clarify whether all students suffering from deafness, blindness, dyslexia, arthritis or any recognised disability will have the right to apply for housing benefit during the course of studies? Such a guarantee would receive a broad welcome from all the organisations involved in representing the needs of the disabled.

While welcoming the announcements, I hope that the Secretary of State will give us further details, and perhaps tell us when the social security offices will be able to spell out in more detail the exact implications of previous statements. Will there be an opportunity for right hon. and hon. Members to discuss them with the Secretary of State? I certainly hope that he will make a public statement and allow us to debate the matter.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the hon. Lady agree that income support and housing benefit are in no way intended to meet the needs of disability, but are intended to meet the basic needs of living? Those benefits do not in any way meet the needs of deaf or otherwise disabled students, so additional benefits are required.

Mrs. Ewing: The hon. Gentleman makes a clear point, and given his recognised knowledge of disability, I am sure that the Secretary of State will take it into account.

I urge the Secretary of State to ensure that the House is given full details so that we can consider the matter with clear minds and a determined attitude, to ensure that no disabled students are disadvantaged.

Mr. Win Griffiths: I, too, shall be brief.

I join other right hon. and hon. Members in welcoming the Government's moves to help disabled students, but let us not give the impression that it was an easy process. There was considerable debate in Committee and much lobbying behind the scenes, and, perhaps because of the way in which it is worded, the Government amendment, perhaps unintentionally, provides that the special conditions will apply only to borrowers who are disabled and not to those who were able-bodied when they borrowed the money but became disabled later, a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith).

I should like to mention a case to illustrate the essential need to consider disabled students and to take a decision, and to seek an assurance from the Secretary of State that, when assessing the income of disabled graduates, the Government will take fully into account that part of their income which is needed to cover the cost of disablement. The case also illustrates the inadequacy of the disabled students allowance. It involves a social work student in her second year at a midlands university. She is seriously contemplating giving up her studies and her ambition to become a social worker working with disabled people. She is 25 years old, she has cerebral palsy, is physically unable to write and has severe mobility problems.

At the beginning of her course she had to spend £2,500 on an adapted computer with twin disk drive and original commands plus an adapter printer. In addition, she has had to find £90 a month to pay two part-time carers to drive her to the campus as that is the only feasible means of transport available. Out of a maximum of £765 disabled students allowance, which is now going up to £1,000, she has had to pay £350 a year out of her maintenance grant towards those extra costs. She will have those extra costs after she graduates and, hopefully, finds the employment to which she aspires.

Will the Secretary of State assure us that disabled students' extra needs are taken fully into account when assessing their disposable income and the level at which they trigger off their repayments?

Mr. Simon Hughes: I join the tribute paid to the concessions made by the Government and to the work of those who represent the disabled. They have made strong representations to all concerned and have persuasively made their case.

It is sad that the amazing disadvantages in education faced by many disabled people have not been recognised. Anyone who has looked into the additional costs and disadvantages experienced by disabled people knows that considerable financial prejudice is suffered by anyone who is deaf, blind or physically or mentally disabled.

10.15 pm

I hope that the Secretary of State will answer hon. Members' questions, but I have a further question. Two issues arise from Government amendment (a) and Lords amendment No. 9 which I hope the Secretary of State will address. First, what are the implications of Government amendment (a) for people who become disabled later in life? Secondly, what does he intend by the phrase

"Shall make such separate provision"

as he considers appropriate?
Separate provision may mean that mobility or attendance allowance is excluded from a disabled person's income for the purpose of calculating the method or time of repayment. If that is so, separate provision should be automatic, because attendance and mobility allowance should not be included. They compensate for other needs and should be discounted, as they are for tax purposes.

I hope that that is not the meaning of Government amendment (a), because if it is it means that no concession is being made. I hope that it means that substantial other improvements will be made in the financial terms for disabled people. Unless the Secretary of State sets out the details, we shall be sceptical. I hope that he will give detailed answers and thereby allay the continuing concerns of those for whom this is probably the most important debate on the Bill

Mr. MacGregor: I shall be brief, because I know that the House wishes to move to the other debates, but in so doing I shall endeavour to answer all the questions that have been asked.

The Government accept the principle of Lords amendment No. 9, which was made on Third Reading in the other place. Government amendment (a) is essentially a tidying amendment.

Lords amendment No. 9 is intended to enshrine in primary legislaton the requirement that regulations shall set out conditions for disabled people repaying loans, which are separate from the conditions set out for the generality of borrowers. There are, however, difficulties with the drafting of Lords amendment No. 9, which Government amendment (a) tidies. First, it clearly imposes a duty on the Secretary of State. That was no doubt intended by the other place, but the wording did not quite achieve that. The amendment needs tidying in other respects to remove the unnecessary reference to students who will not be repaying loans and to make it clear that the regulations should contain this separate provision. Those points are covered accurately by the Bill and do not affect the substance of what we are trying to do.

I am grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) and for Bury, North (Mr. Burt) for pointing out that the Government have already responded. In a parliamentary answer on 19 March, I responded to several points that had been made about disabled people. The right way to proceed was to listen carefully to debates and then to respond. That partly answers the point made by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). He referred to disabled people not working in subsequent years or receiving low incomes, but they will not have to make repayments during those years. Those on low incomes will be fully covered by the arrangements that apply to everyone else.

On 19 March I announced particular provision for disabled people: that there will be separate repayment arrangements for borrowers, which will take the form of a disregard of disability-related benefits for the purpose of assessing a disabled graduate's income for deferment.

Mr. Wigley: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall answer the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe first. He and other hon. Members asked about people who become disabled after graduation. The plan to disregard the disability-related benefit income of disabled repayers will apply at the time of the repaying if at that time the individual is disabled. Therefore, it will apply to those who become disabled subsequently.

Mr. Alfred Morris: How will a young man or woman cope if, after graduation, he or she gradually becomes deaf or blind or suffers from a progressive disease? Will they be expected to repay their loans, although for the reasons I gave in my speech their financial problems increase as their working life proceeds?

Mr. MacGregor: Such people will be expected to repay the loans if they have incomes which, after netting off the disability-related benefits, would take them into the income brackets where loans are repaid. They will have the advantage of netting off the disability-related benefits, which will make the appropriate difference.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State tell the House whether he has had any discussions with the Department of Social Security about the definition of disablement and say whether it includes those who are deaf?

Mr. MacGregor: I know that this subject is being discussed in the Department of Social Security and that draft regulations relating to student social security entitlement are being considered by the Social Security Advisory Committee, which is consulting widely. If hon. Members wish to make representations or points about these matters, they should make them to my right hon. Friend.

The amendment does not affect the provision, because it will be included in regulations which will be subject initially to the affirmative resolution procedure. We are putting in the Bill a requirement to consider the needs of the disabled. Given the safeguard of inscription in the Bill, there is no need for the lesser safeguard contained in Opposition amendment (c), whereby such regulations would continue to be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. The provision in the Opposition's amendment (b) for deaf students would be misplaced in regulations applying to the timing and manner of repayment. Entitlement to benefit will have no bearing on the arrangements for top-up loans.

The key points are these. Deaf students will have particularly extensive resources available to them, especially in view of our decision to enhance significantly the disabled students allowance, payable with the mandatory grant. That is my immediate rebuttal to the point made by the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe. That allowance will go to deaf students. It has been increased by 30 per cent., as I announced on 19 March, and I hope that the House feels that that is a generous response to the previous requests and shows that we have taken note of points made during debate. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North said, not only is that an increase up to £1,000 for everyone, but in addition we have introduced allowances up to £3,000 for specialist equipment during a course and up to £4,000 for non-medical helpers. I hope that the House feels that these are important additions.

I assure the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) that the administration of the disabled students allowance, including the additional allowances, will be as now. They will be administered by the local education authority in England and by the Scottish Education Department in Scotland. There will be no cash limit. The disabled retention of benefits will be based on the disability premium criteria, subject to parliamentary scrutiny of the DSS regulations. Those regulations will come before Parliament in due course, which will enable further discussion to take place.

Taken together, these are significant advances to help the disabled, including deaf students. They will enable deaf students to avoid building up additional debts as a result of disability, and I hope that the House will welcome them. I ask the House to accept the Government amendment in preference to that from another place and to reject the two Opposition amendments.

Lords amendment disagreed to.

Amendment (a) in lieu of Lords amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: I rule, as I ruled previously in respect of Lords amendment No. 8, that Lords amendment No. 10 imposes a charge upon the public revenue not authorised by resolution of the House; therefore, under paragraph 3 of Standing Order No. 76, it is deemed to be disagreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 11 to 15 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 16, in page 4, line 51, at end insert—

"(8) No document sent in connection with loans under the arrangements by any such person or body as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) above shall be regarded as sent with a view to financial gain within the meaning of section 50 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (circulars to minors)."

Mr. Jackson: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is a technical amendment for the avoidance of doubt. It allows the Student Loans Company to make information about the scheme widely available, including schools where pupils are thinking about undertaking higher education and higher education institutions where, of course, some students are minors. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made this matter of conveying information to everyone a top priority in his speeches in Committee. The amendment also enables the company to send loan agreement forms to students who are under 18 and who have applied for a loan.

The Government always intended that students under 18 should be eligible for loans. We also intended that the scheme should satisfy the requirements of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Section 50 of that Act prohibits the sending of documents to minors with a view to financial gain, inviting them to borrow money or to apply for information or to get advice on borrowing money. That section is untested. The words are lucid, but the application is unclear. The crucial words in the amendment are

"with a view to financial gain".

The common-sense view, which I know hon. Members and the other place will take, is that the Student Loans Company Ltd. could not be construed as operating with a view to financial gain from loans. However, we have been advised that the courts might conclude that section 50 technically prevented the company from disseminating information about the scheme and from sending loan agreement documents to applicants. Of course it would have been quite wrong to allow the scheme to proceed in conditions of such uncertainty, and it is right to put it beyond doubt that, in sending information or invitations——

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Minister is talking about sending out information. Has the law been broken by sending schools student loan information leaflets, thereby disseminating the information to people who are under 18?

Mr. Jackson: I do not think that that could possibly be the case. We are talking about information on legislation that has not yet been enacted. The information was quite properly sent out under the rules that govern the provision of information following Second Reading. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey was rightly eloquent about that matter. I can remember Opposition Members arguing in Committee that such information should be provided, and we have provided it.

It would clearly be wrong to allow the scheme to proceed with such uncertainty and it is right to put it beyond doubt that, in sending information or invitations, the company is not acting with a view to financial gain. That is why I commend Lords amendment No. 16 to the House.

Mr. Andrew Smith: The amendment is part of the shambles that results from the fact that the Government have not given proper thought to the Bill. We have come to a new matter for discussion, and the Minister introduced an amendment on that important matter 13 minutes before the guillotine motion expires. That is an indictment of the Government and shows the incompetent way in which they have handled the Bill from beginning to end.

While the Government amendment from the other place attempts to get round the problems posed by the operation of the Consumer Credit Act, it does not really resolve the issue. It raises as many questions as it answers and, in the limited time available I shall list some of them.

Are the information leaflets being sent out by the Government, and distributed through the schools, breaking the existing law? I have just put that question to the Under-Secretary, who did not answer it. The Government need to reconsider that matter. If someone signs up for the loan before they are 18, are they obliged to pay it back afterwards? I do not know, and the Government need to tell us.

What of the position in Scotland, where many students commence their higher education before the age of 18? In the Bill, the Government have shown a despicable lack of regard for the Scottish interest in higher education—a disregard which they have shown from the outset, and show on all matters relating to Scotland. Is parental consent required for those under 18 to engage in the loans, and what is the position of students for whom it might not be forthcoming? Are guarantors required for those students taking out loans when under 18, and what provision is the administration of the scheme making for that?

10.30 pm

These are not minor administrative details, but important questions. It says a great deal about the incompetence and shambles which have characterised the Bill that they were discovered only at the last minute in the Lords and we are having to discuss them just nine minutes before the guillotine descends. In the Lords, Lord Peston said that such matters were all part of the danger of starting on the slippery slope of encouraging, virtually obliging, young people to go into debt to see themselves through higher education. It is shameful, and what is wrong here—and wrong with the Bill as a whole—is that it turns education into a matter of ability to pay and borrow. It gets young people into debt, when education should be available to them as of right.

Will the Minister give a straight answer to the questions that I have put this evening? As it stands, the amendment is one more sign of the shambolic nature of a Bill that has been characterised by incompetence throughout.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): As usual, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) makes the telling points. He raised the question of Scotland, in which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson) and I have an interest. In Scotland, a higher proportion of students go to university at 17—a number go to university or college at 16. The amendment appears to encourage them to circumvent, if it needs to be circumvented, the Consumer Credit Act 1974, to ensure that credit can be offered to people under the age of 18, and the Government can induce such people to take out credit.

The Minister said that he was moving the amendment for the avoidance of doubt. He certainly was not moving it for the avoidance of debt, because debt is what the amendment is all about. It is clear that the country is already awash with credit, yet the Government wish to unload even more on people and, in so doing, unload their responsibility to fund students and their education.

Consumer credit has doubled in the past year, and more than £3 billion-worth is now given. The Minister wants to add to that credit among the crucial category of young people under the age of 18. Two thirds of the 21 million households in this country have a total of more than 40 million transaction commitments to credit companies and other credit organisations. In moving the amendment, the Minister seeks to add to their burden.

One million people already have difficulty keeping up with their consumer credit agreements. Two million people already have problems repaying their debts. Four million already have four or more financial credit agreements, and the Minister is asking students under the age of 18, as well as those older than that to take on one more agreement.

When the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that he saw nothing wrong with giving credit cards to children, we did not know that the Government would move so quickly to amend the law to permit that type of practice. I urge the Minister and the Government to think again on this inappropriate clause.

Mr. Jackson: I was asked two questions by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). First, the leaflet certainly does not breach the Consumer Credit Act, because it is in no sense an invitation to borrow. Secondly, he asked about the enforceability of loans to minors——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Jackson: I shall not give way.

The leaflet is a description of a system that would enable—if it is approved by our two Houses—the possibility of borrowing. In no way would that be construed as contrary to the Consumer Credit Act.

As for the enforceability of loans to minors, I have been informed that in Scotland, which is always in a special position, these loans probably are enforceable against minors. In England and Wales, they are probably not enforceable unless the minor ratifies them on reaching his majority, as they are not made for the purchase of necessities. When appropriate, minors who have received loans will be asked to ratify them on reaching their majority. If they refuse to do so, no action will be taken against them, but they will not be entitled to receive further loans under the scheme.

This strikes an appropriate balance between the interests of the students and those of the taxpayer. Meanwhile, this is merely a technical amendment, for the avoidance of doubt. It embodies the common-sense view that the Student Loans Company Ltd. will not act with a view to financial gain. Section 50 of the Act is clearly difficult to interpret. The courts have not yet had occasion to examine it, and we believe that it would be wrong to leave minors or the company in a position of uncertainty. It seems sensible to the Government, therefore, and to the noble Lords in another place, to clarify on the face of the Bill what most people would in any case have thought: that the company will not operate with a view to financial gain from loans. I hope the House will join me in supporting the Lords amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes: As we are driven towards the fall of the guillotine, I merely point out that the debate has revealed how inappropriate it is to start trying to mix the worlds of education and of credit. The Minister's last answer showed that it is impossible to reconcile the two interests. We should never have had to exclude students from the provisions of consumer legislation. As an epilogue to the Bill, the Government are introducing the marketplace to education, where it never belonged.

Mr. Straw: It was apparent from the remarks of the Under-Secretary that the Government intend, and have already carried out the intention, to send circulars to minors inducing them to borrow money. The House also heard how the Under-Secretary could offer no proper answer to the detailed questions that my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) asked him.

In the closing seconds of this guillotined debate, I should like to place it on record that, because of the guillotine forced on the House by the Secretary of State and his hon. Friends, the House has been denied the chance properly to debate major issues of principle [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are the Opposition?"] They are not here because they cannot debate the issues; if they could, they would be.

This procedure represents an abuse of Parliament by the Government.

Question put and agreed to.

It being six hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order this day, to put the Question already proposed from the Chair.

Question agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 17, in page 4, line 51, at end insert:

"Restriction on disclosure of information

3A.—(1) No person or body having by virtue of paragraph 3 above the function of making and recovering loans shall provide or make available to anyone else (whether for consideration or not) any information held for the purpose of discharging those functions if the information is to be used for soliciting custom for goods or services.

(2) As respects information constituting personal data for the purposes of the Data Protection Act 1984 sub-paragraph (1) above is without prejudice to the requirements of that Act but applies irrespective of any consent given for the purposes of that Act by the person to whom the information relates." —[Mr. MacGregor.]

Ordered,

That a Committee be appointed to draw up reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to their amendments Nos. 5, 8 and 10.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

Ordered,

That Mr. Sydney Chapman, Mr. Robert Jackson, Mr. Secretary MacGregor, Mr. Andrew Smith and Mr. Jack Straw be members of the Committee.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

Ordered,

That three be the Quorum of the Committee.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

Ordered,

That the Committee do withdraw immediately.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. One of the amendments which was passed in the other place, and with which we have disagreed, was moved by my noble Friend Earl Russell. Is it not inappropriate that no colleague of his can take part in the Committee proceedings that you have now put in motion? Is it not an exclusion of an opportunity for hon. Members in this place, of my party—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] —and of others, who have been here all evening, to participate in its proceedings? I speak for the nationalists as well as for the Ulster parties. We are allowed to take part in debates in both Houses, but we are not allowed to participate in a procedure that results in us telling the other place that we disagree.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is late in raising his point of order. The motion to which it relates has already been agreed to, and the Committee should withdraw immediately.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When you moved the remaining amendment at the end of our consideration of the Bill, you did not refer to my amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 17, which related to the privacy rights of students, over which the Bill will ride roughshod. It is an important matter——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot advance that argument. He was caught, sadly, by the guillotine. It was not possible for him to move his amendment to the Lords amendment.

Lakeside Health Centre

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Goodlad.]

10.44 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I am grateful for this opportunity to draw to the attention of the House the difficulties that are facing Lakeside health centre, which is located in my constituency. So often in Adjournment debates on health centres, the focus is on hospital facilities, and there is a tendency for the important role that is played by general practitioners to be taken for granted. I am pleased, therefore, to be able to draw attention to the valuable work that is being done by Lakeside health centre, which provides a comprehensive range of primary care services to those of my constituency who live in Thamesmead, a 1970s development which includes many system-built high-rise properties. Thamesmead has suffered from the misguided housing policies of successive Greater London council administrations and has more than its share of problems.

The practice is housed in system-built accommodation which was designed to be a health centre for 6,000 patients. Lakeside now has 12,000 registered patients. As the practice was designed to deal with half that number, an additional burden has been placed upon those who work at the centre.

Despite the difficulties, Lakeside is a good example of how a health centre should operate and it provides an extremely comprehensive range of services to the local community. The six-partner general practice based there offers the full range of additional services which general practitioners are being encouraged to provide, such as ante-natal care, minor surgery and diabetes and well woman clinics. In addition, district services such as dentistry, chiropody and speech therapy are provided at the clinic, as well as out-patient clinics held by consultants in a wide range of specialties.

The senior partner of the practice when it first opened in 1969 until his retirement in 1988 was Professor Peter Higgins, professor of general practice at Guy's hospital. He has now retired, but he continues to take a keen interest in the work of Lakeside health centre and of other groups in Thamesmead, and I should like to place on record my gratitude for all that he has done in the area and continues to do.

Peter Higgins forged a strong link between the centre and the education and training of general practitioners, and that link continues. Currently, all six partners hold part-time teaching posts with the united medical schools —Guy's and St. Thomas's—and medical students, both undergraduate and postgraduate, are regularly in attendance at the centre.

The link with professional education also has an influence on the way that services are provided at Lakeside health centre. As one would expect of doctors who are involved in the education of general practitioners, the practice at Lakeside is already pursuing policies which other practices are now being encouraged by the Government to adopt.

The doctors at Lakeside have worked hard to educate their patients and make them aware that good clinical practice does not require patients to be given a prescription every time they visit the doctor. As a consequence, the practice's prescribing costs are some 20 per cent. less than the average for other practices within the Greenwich and Bexley family practitioner committee area and about 25 per cent. less than the national average. Similarly, over 50 per cent. of prescribing is of generic alternatives to brand name drugs.

The practice has also embraced the use of information technology for a wide range of applications, and has appointed a practice manager to ensure efficient delivery of patient care.

The partners at Lakeside are committed to putting the needs of the patient first and their success in doing so is borne out by the comments of my constituents. I often hear the doctors and other staff at Lakeside praised by constituents, and I have never yet received a single complaint about the quality of health care which the centre provides.

In 1987, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, who was then Minister for Health, visited Lakeside health centre as part of a visit to Bexley health district. His comment at the time was that Lakeside

> "was an inner-city practice serving an inner-city population but in an outer London borough."

His view was, and still is, entirely correct and neatly sums up the situation in Thamesmead.

A large number of Thamesmead residents are from the inner city, having been decanted from areas of south London, designated for slum clearance and compulsory purchase, to Thamesmead in the early 1970s. In addition, a number of local authorities took advantage of the opportunity which Thamesmead offered and moved some of their tenants with social difficulties to Thamesmead.

Because the practice has all the problems associated with an inner-city practice, the work load of each doctor is high. With 12,000 registered patients, each doctor has a list of around 2,000. That is not particularly large for many practices, but it would be difficult for the doctors at Lakeside to expand their lists beyond that number without reducing the quality of the health care that they provide given that the consultation rate per patient at Lakeside is around 30 per cent. higher than average. A measure of the effect that that high consultation rate has is that the practice can expect to see over 90 per cent. of all female patients at least once a year.

The difficulties that the practice faces are not helped by the building in which it is located. The design of the health centre is such that effective use cannot be made of the space available. There is no proper storage facility for patients' medical records, which are simply kept on open racks behind the reception desk. The number of consulting rooms is insufficient for a large and busy practice which offers a wide range of services. Until recently, these problems were made worse by the need for some of the partners to keep buckets on their examination couches to catch the rain water coming through the roof, although I am pleased to say that the roof has now been repaired.

Because of all the problems associated with the building, the partners asked the district health authority to carry out repairs and alterations. It was agreed that a programme of work would be carried out in three phases at a total cost of £100,000. Phase 1 was the repair of the roof which, as I have already said, has been carried out. Phase 2 was internal structural alterations to make better use of the existing space by providing a proper storage facility for records and three much-needed additional consulting rooms. Phase 3 was minor general repairs and decoration. I regret to say that phases 2 and 3 have been halted by Bexley health authority because of a lack of funds for capital projects.

When the partners first brought the matter to my attention, I naturally raised it with the Brian Hord, the chairman of Bexley health authority. While he was sympathetic to the needs of Lakeside, and hoped that the district would be able to complete the work in the next financial year, he told me that there were no guarantees that the work would proceed, because Bexley health authority had not received capital resources of £300,000 which it had expected from South Thames regional health authority. As a consequence, a number of projects had been stopped, including the remaining work at Lakeside.

I am extremely concerned that the work has been abandoned because it is not simply a question of making the centre look better, although I believe that the partners, as tenants of the district health authority, are entitled to expect their landlord to keep the premises in reasonable decorative order. The delay in carrying out alterations affects the treatment which is being provided for patients, because the changes are necessary to ensure the effective delivery of service to patients. Until such time as the additional facilities are available, the pressure on existing consulting space will continue. The partners are asking not for lavish suites of room, but simply for the provision of enough consulting rooms to enable them to provide a proper service for their patients.

I have no doubt that the district and the regional health authorities have prepared their arguments as to where the money is, why it was not available and who is to blame, although from my point of view all that is unimportant. My immediate concern is that some of my constituents are not receiving health care in an appropriate manner because essential work has not been carried out. The work must be done. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take whatever steps he can to ensure that the work is carried out with all possible speed.

The other major issue which has caused considerable concern at Lakeside health centre applies equally to practices in other areas similar to Thamesmead. None the less, it has specific implications for Lakeside. I refer to the criteria for eligibility for deprivation payments under the new general practitioner contract. My hon. Friend will already be aware of some of my concerns from our correspondence on the issue. As I have already said, Thamesmead suffers many of the problems normally associated with inner-city areas, with possibly one exception—that there is little overcrowding because of the modern housing stock, although living in high-rise, system-built dwellings can bring problems of a different kind.

As a consequence, the electoral ward of Thamesmead, East, which is in my constituency, has a score of over 27 on the Jarman index of deprivation, the measure of deprivation used to determine eligibility for payments under the new contract. To put that score into perspective, we must remember that only 15 per cent. of the population live in areas where the Jarman score is over 20. Thamesmead, East is certainly different from the other wards in my constituency. Of the other wards, the next nearest score is 18, and the remainder are much lower, mostly in single figures. That further confirms my earlier remarks about Thamesmead.

The deprivation allowance paid since the beginning of this month is given only to practices in areas with a Jarman score of more than 30—not on a sliding scale or taper of any kind, but based on a once-and-for-all threshold of 30. The difference in the problems experienced by practices in areas that score between 29 and 31 must be negligible, yet one will receive the allowance in full while the other will receive nothing. That is illogical and unfair. As the Jarman score for Thamesmead, East is "only" 27, Lakeside does not qualify for the allowance.

That is unsatisfactory, not only because Lakeside is the kind of practice that should receive additional help but because it is likely that the Jarman score would be higher if it were based on up-to-date statistics. The current figure is based on information from the 1981 census, but Thamesmead has changed significantly since then. For example, a Vietnamese community of about 600 has moved into the area since then, and its specific problems are not reflected in the Jarman scale.

Lakeside is not the kind of practice that is able to generate additional income beyond the basic allowances. Despite the determined efforts of the centre's doctors, meeting immunisation and cervical cytology targets is a difficult, if not impossible, task. Doctors in a practice such as Lakeside can expect to work harder and to earn less than they would elsewhere—and with the high cost of living in the south-east, recruitment is always a problem.

Deprivation payments should be made to practices such as Lakeside which have problems that they cannot alter or overcome by adopting a different approach, because the problems are beyond their control. There is no logic in the present system, which stipulates that if an area does not have a Jarman score of more than 30 it does not qualify. Given that a small percentage of the population live in areas having a Jarman score of more than 20, it would be logical to pay the allowance on a tapering scale, at least to areas scoring more than 25. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister, who I know is always concerned with the quality of health care, to give that suggestion serious consideration.

Lakeside health centre does a first-class job in difficult circumstances, and its situation has not been helped by the delay in making vital changes to the centre's fabric, or by the current system for paying deprivation allowances. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to exert what pressure he can to remedy the situation there. The doctors and staff at Lakeside do what is asked of them and the rest of the NHS, by putting the needs of their patients first. We must help by providing the resources that they need to continue providing my constituents in Thamesmead with health care of a standard that they are entitled to expect.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Roger Freeman): I congratulate my hon. Friend for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on his good fortune in securing this Adjournment debate and on the able way in which he presented the case for Lakeside health centre. My hon. Friend is a valiant and persistent defender of and advocate for his constituents. He is a Member of Parliament whom the Department of Health knows well and much respects for his activities in the south-east region and in his constituency.

I had the pleasure of visiting my hon. Friend's constituency on 16 January in relation to Erith hospital—an issue that has not yet been resolved, although I hope that it soon will be. In any event, that is not the subject of tonight's debate.

My hon. Friend alluded to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton) was much impressed by Lakeside health centre when he visited it in 1987. It provides a wide range of services, and my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford touched on some of them. They include audiology, dental care, dietary and speech therapy, family planning, child care, chiropody—an excellent range of services assisting his constituents, provided by a range of staff, including six general practitioners, a practice nurse, two qualified nurses, the equivalent of four and a half whole-time employees who act as receptionists and another four and a half whole-time equivalents acting as clerical and secretarial assistants. I was interested to hear my hon. Friend refer to information technology in use at the centre, a development that we are anxious to encourage.

How great the local need is for health care services, primary services in particular, of that quality was graphically described by my hon. Friend. Those needs, arising from social deprivation—one-parent families, limited employment opportunities and the arrival of new communities from as far afield as Bangladesh and Vietnam—were much in the mind of Professor Peter Higgins when setting up the general practice at the Lakeside health centre in the mid-1970s.

As professor of general practice at Guy's hospital, Professor Higgins was in the vanguard of those who believed that a health centre should play a positive social, as well as medical, role in [illegible] community, and for almost two decades he has guided young trainee GPs in that philosophy.

Professor Higgins, as well as being the vice-chairman of South East Thames regional health authority, has done much valuable work in developing funding for general practice and is currently advising the Department of Health on the general practice implications of the White Paper. Indeed, Lakeside health centre could hardly have two more formidable champions than Professor Higgins and my hon. Friend. I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to Professor Higgins for his long service in the South East Thames regional health authority area. I recently had the pleasure of being with him when I visited the Medway towns.

My hon. Friend raised as his first issue the question of deprivation payments. The Government believe that it is right to reward GPs for the extra work involved in caring for patients who live in areas of deprivation. As part of the GPs' new contract, a capitation payment has been introduced from 1 April linked to an index of deprivation developed by Professor Jarman of St. Mary's hospital medical school.

The British Medical Association's general medical services committee agrees with the Government that the Jarman index provides the best means currently available. The index is made up taking into account a number of factors, including unemployment, the numbers of elderly people living alone, household overcrowding, the number of children under five, the number of unskilled, single-parent households, the number of residents in ethnic households and the numbers who have moved house, giving an indication of the mobility of the population.

My hon. Friend mentioned the census of 1981. We will shortly have a fresh census, in 1991, and I am the Minister responsible for its preparation. The index figures will be updated once the new statistics from the census are available.

Our policy objectives are to target deprivation payments on those practices that serve areas of highest deprivation. We have therefore chosen a cut-off point of 30 index points, although I accept that this means that some practices—for example, those to which my hon. Friend referred—which fall just short of that figure will not receive payment.

That is not to say that we do not recognise the hard work and dedication put in by such practices in providing general medical services to their patients. As my hon. Friend will recognise, the question where to draw the line is a matter of judgment. Under the scheme, about 9 per cent. of patients in England will generate a deprived area payment for their general practitioner. That seems to us very reasonable.

If we had chosen a much lower cut-off point—say, 16 on the Jarman index, which would then certainly include my hon. Friend's general practice patient lists—we would be including about 25 per cent. of the population in England, a much broader number, and we would, if we were not to provide additional resources by deducting them from some other part of the NHS, have to spread the £25 million, which it will cost in 1990-91 to make those payments, much more thinly.

Therefore, I strongly believe that that would have been to the detriment of the existing scheme. In areas where the deprivation index is between 30 and 39, it amounts to £4·90 per head on the patient list; for an index of between 40 and 49 it amounts to £6·40; for an index of more than 50 points—that is very severe deprivation, such as in some of the inner-London wards—it amounts to a payment of £8·50. Therefore, as my hon. Friend will calculate, for an average patient list of 2,000 patients, that means £17,000 extra to the general practitioner to help him to develop his services.

The Government believe that we have got the concentration and the targeting right, but I can give my hon. Friend the assurance—we shall study the Official Report of the debate with care—that the Government will monitor the GPs' new contract to ensure that it is achieving the Government's objective of raising standards and extending services. We shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend says about the consequences of a cut-off point at 30.

On the second point that my hon. Friend made, I can perhaps give him greater encouragement and assurances than I have been able to give him so far—the building at Lakeside. It is perhaps a product of the 1970s— a glass and concrete design with flat roofs. There is so much glass that in cold weather the building has been too cold, and in sunny weather the staff and patients have been too hot. The Lakeside centre was an award-winning architectural design but technical problems have arisen and, sadly, vandalism has also defaced the building.

In modern designs for such health centres, we would concentrate more on energy conservation; we might use brick, which is certainly a more friendly medium for a building; we would certainly have pitched roofs; and we would try to make buildings more vandal-proof.

It is of course the roof that has been the cause of most recent problems but, as my hon. Friend has tellingly pointed out, other structural renovations are sorely needed. Bexley health authority and South East Thames regional health authority are both very much aware of this. In fact, a £100,000 renovation programme was planned for 1989, which would have brought the centre up to a generally acceptable standard. Unfortunately, after £40,000 of that sum had been spent on roof repairs, the programme had to be frozen. The reasons for that, although complicated in financial terms, can be traced back, link by link, to the primary cause of a fall in land values.

Apart from capital money from regions, most district health authorities, particularly in the south-east, have planned to supplement their funds from capital derived from land sales. Bexley health authority was no exception. I understand that genuine expectations were held by Bexley health authority of selling a plot of land adjacent to Bexley hospital for more than £350,000. Of this sum, £100,000 was earmarked for the renovation of Lakeside health centre. South East Thames regional health authority had in fact advanced £350,000 to Bexley in anticipation of the sum being raised. Unfortunately, the sale has not been completed because of issues involving planning permission, particularly tree preservation orders.

I recall that, as a Back Bencher, I introduce a private Member's Bill, which eventually became law, dealing with the protection of trees and the prevention of the removal of trees subject to preservation orders when planning permission was required. To that extent, I apologise to my hon. Friend if I have in any way caused problems to him and to his constituency.

Bexley health authority hopes to find a way round those problems, but is not in a position yet to give any guarantee. In view of this, and in the light of its own serious shortfall in capital resources—another consequence of falling land values—South East Thames regional health authority had reluctantly to withdraw its bridging loan to Bexley.

Bexley health authority's capital programme for 1990-91 stands at £1·1 million. The authority does not yet know how much of the programme it will be able to fulfil until it learns what uncommitted capital it can expect to receive from the regional health authority. Negotiations are taking place. I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand if I do not say anything further here which may prejudge them. I can say, however, that Bexley health authority is optimistic that, from one source or another, it will have sufficient funds to complete the programme for Lakeside health centre during 1990-91. Thus rejuvenated, the centre will, I am sure, provide as fine a service for future generations of Thamesmeaders as it has for almost two decades past.

As for my hon. Friend's point regarding deprivation allowances, although by targeting the resources we have omitted the ward in which the centre is placed, I can assure him that we shall monitor carefully the effect of the scheme. Where changes are necessary, we shall certainly consider them.

I am as confident as I can be that the problems with the building to which he alluded will be put right. I plan to visit Lakeside, upon my hon. Friend's invitation, in the spring of next year—by which time I hope that Bexley's plans will have been brought to fruition—to see progress for myself and to see a fine health centre in operation.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 5 April 1990

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Human Embryos

9.34 am

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I have the honour to present three petitions containing many signatures—up to 2,000—from my constituents. They come from Our Lady of the Visitation church, Greenford, in the name of Mrs. J. Balaam of 358 Greenford road, Greenford; Father Phil Barry and his clergy at St. Bernard's church, Northolt; Father Antony Brunning of 17 Mandeville road, Northolt, his clergy, supporters and many others; and the Abbey church of St. Benedict, Ealing in the name of Isabelle Glover of 70 Claremont road, W13, supported by Dom Francis Rossiter, Abbot of Ealing and Benedictine Abbot of All England, Father Michael Hopley and the communities of St. Benedict, Ealing.

The petitioners call for the protection of the human embryo, which they believe to be seriously threatened by the proposals shortly to be placed before the House. They believe, and I share their belief, that there is human life from the moment of conception, that that life is made in the image of God and that it should not be violated under any circumstances by experimentation. I strongly support that view and hope that the House will reject any move to allow experimentation on the human embryo in the Bill shortly to be discussed in the House.

The humble petition of the parishioners of our Lady of the Visitation church, St. Bernards church, Northolt and the Abbey Church of St. Benedict, Ealing showeth that we affirm that the newly-fertilised embryo is a real, living human being:

Therefore, we welcome the statement in the report of the Committee of Inquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (the Warnock Report) That "the status of the embryo is a matter of fundamental principle which should be enshrined in legislation", and its recommendation that the embryo of the human species should be afforded protection in law; and therefore we oppose all such practices as are recommended in the Report which discriminate against the embryo or violate his/her human dignity and right to life.

Wherefore, your petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which (a) forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding or freezing of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned); and (b) forbids all forms of trans-species fertilisation.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray etc.

I beg to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Irish Republic (Extradition)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Goodlad.]

9.38 am

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ross: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. We usually debate Northern Ireland business so late that you are not present. However, I am sure that you, as the chief commoner of England, are so interested in this matter that you will stay. I would like to extend that to the whole United Kingdom. The matter that I wish to discuss is of great importance to the common people of this Kingdom, and their rights and privileges under the Crown, especially with regard to their desire to remain under the rule of the Crown.

I should be far happier if I were speaking to a crowded House, but a debate such as this gives one a chance to place on record the views of the Unionist people of Northern Ireland.

I have no doubt that the few hon. Members present, and the many more people outside, will remember the euphoria when the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed. In our debates, arguments and questions, time and time again the Government Front Bench gave two reasons why the United Kingdom had entered into that agreement. Briefly, they were that for the first time the position of Northern Ireland was recognised by the Irish Republic and that extradition of members of terrorist organisations—to be more specific, of the IRA—from the Irish Republic was assured.

At the time, the ordinary folk of the Unionist community said, through their representatives, that the Government's view on the first reason was incorrect. I am amazed that, even after the Dublin Supreme Court judgment in the case of McGimpsey, the Government will still not admit that the Unionist population was correct in believing that the words in the constitution of the Republic have their normal, everyday meaning. That matter will be covered in the next debate. I do not want to pre-empt what the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) will say on that matter, but I should put it on record that the Unionist population got it right and the Government got it wrong.

I last spoke on this subject in an Adjournment debate at Christmas in 1987 when I drew attention to the requirements of the Irish Extradition (Amendment) Act 1987 in the Irish Republic. Those requirements were important then and they are even more important today, as the judgments in the cases of Finucane and Clarke relate to offences before that Act came into force.

In that debate I pointed out that, under Irish law, a full book of evidence must be available to the Republic and that some of the evidence that might be needed would be available only after the RUC had questioned the people concerned. In Irish law that requirement applies only to United Kingdom requests for extradition.

In the same debate I also said that the treaty made extradition impossible unless we paid a constitutional price and the price of interference with the judiciary in Britain. We have not paid that price and we may now be seeing the outcome of the blackmail inherent in what was being said in the Irish Republic at the time.

[Mr. Ross]

The plain truth is that, in the Irish Republic, judges take an oath to uphold the constitution and the institutions of the state. They have now clearly spelt out what they are meant to uphold. I do not take issue with them on that, but I do take issue with my Government for being so foolish as to believe that they could weave their way round the straightforward language of the Irish constitution.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Does my hon. Friend agree that many right hon. and hon. Members would like to know whether Her Majesty's Government have yet considered the full implications of recent decisions in the Irish Supreme Court, and whether a policy has been decided with regard to future requests from the Government of the Irish Republic for the return of Irish citizens who, according to Irish law, are now deemed to have been unconstitutionally extradited to the United Kingdom?

Mr. Ross: Many of those people are serving or have served prison sentences in the United Kingdom. My hon. Friend makes an interesting point and I hope that the Minister will provide him with an answer, as I hope that he will provide me.

The debate to which I referred in December 1987 followed two questions to the Prime Minister on 1 December. In reply to one of them the right hon. Lady said that she regretted that,

> "notwithstanding our representations, the Irish Government are taking additional measures that could make extradition more difficult . . . It is essential that we maintain effective extradition arrangements so that there is no hiding place for terrorists. I agree with my hon. Friend that what the Republic is doing by taking this step is making us the least favoured nation in this matter."

Therefore, the Government cannot now say that they were unaware of the implications of the 1987 Act. Perhaps they hoped that those who committed offences before that legislation came into operation might still be extradited. However, that hope has been holed and fairly thoroughly sunk.

On the same day, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker), the Prime Minister said:

> "There is a risk that extradition could become more difficult because of the new measures taken by the Irish Republic and that they would be a step backwards from the existing arrangements".—[Official Report, 1 December 1987; Vol. 123, c. 762.]

Twice on the same day, the Prime Minister said with great clarity that the Government were fully aware of the Irish bog of deception and mistrust into which they were wandering and in which they now find themselves up to the neck. Surely we shall not be told today that this has all come as a great surprise. They knew in 1987 that that would happen.

In answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), on 14 December 1988 the Attorney-General clarified the position of the 1987 legislation. He said:

> "In cases unaffected by the Irish Extradition (Amendment) Act 1987, the only documents required of United Kingdom police forces by Irish law are warrants of arrest and affidavits and certificates supporting them. No further explanation of such cases ordinarily is required."

That was pre-1987. He went on:

> "In cases to which the 1987 Act does apply, sufficient information has to be given to the Irish Attorney-General to satisfy him that the relevant United Kingdom prosecuting authority has a clear intention to prosecute and that this intention is founded upon the existence of sufficient evidence."—[Official Report, 14 December 1988; Vol. 143, c. 569.]

That brings me back to my earlier point that the Irish authorities need the full book of evidence. That, as I pointed out in the previous Adjournment debate, is probably impossible to provide unless the RUC has an opportunity to question in depth the individual concerned.

All that shows clearly the increased difficulties that would arise. But just how great they are is perhaps only now becoming clear to the ordinary citizen in this land as the current reasons for not sending back criminals from the Irish Republic to face justice in the United Kingdom become apparent. Finucane and Clarke are the most recent cases, but they are not, by a long chalk, the first, and they will not be the last. The Father Ryan and the Glenholmes cases stand out in people's memory in Britain, but there are many others of lesser note and we shall see many more in the future.

The reasons for such cases not being sent back differ in detail. Sometimes for the tiniest of technical reasons, extradition requests were refused. As a result, known members of the IRA are still walking round as free men in the Republic. Because of the words used in the judgment to which I referred, they will never be returned to justice in the United Kingdom.

Two reasons were given in the Finucane and Clarke cases. First, it was said that there would be ill treatment by prison officers if they were returned. In that case, the evidence that was used of ill-treatment was the Pettigrew case. But is there any evidence of ill-treatment of persons who have been extradited to Northern Ireland from the Republic? If there is, I am not aware of it. No doubt the Minister will tell us.

I am also curious to know whether the Government would like to contemplate the probable attitude of the Irish courts if they were faced with a request to extradite the persons popularly known as the Birmingham Six, had they ever made it to the Irish Republic. One might also consider what would happen if the British authorities were now to apply for the exrtradition of those who have recently been named as the real Birmingham bombers. Can one imagine any Irish court extraditing such people to the United Kingdom? Twenty-one people were killed in Birmingham and 160 suffered injuries. No doubt many of those injuries were horrific and their effects remain with the people who are still alive. I do not believe that there is any chance of getting any of the people responsible back to the United Kingdom for questioning or trial under any circumstances.

The events of last weekend provide the Irish Republic with another excuse for not returning suspects into the hands of British justice. Given the attitude of the Irish courts, how likely are they to extradite to this country a terrorist who has created murder or mayhem of any kind, when they can point to the events at Strangeways and say that there is no way in which an Irish suspect would be safe? I refer to ill-treatment not by prison officials but by other prisoners. That is a second course that the Irish courts will undoubtedly pick up and use very soon.

One is also seeing the revival of the political offence as a let-off for terrorists of every description. In the Shannon case, one justice held that an offence—which is shorthand for murder or brutal maiming at the hands of the IRA —could be political even if it went beyond reasonable political activity. At the same hearing, another justice held that political immunity depended on the motivation of the individual to be extradited, his intent, and the true nature of the offence—and that all were to be assessed by their closeness to the alleged political objective. That was the reason used in the most recent case to let a suspect off the hook.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) recently drew the attention of the House to the Irish Supreme Court judgment that political exemption from extradition should apply to persons accused of politically motivated offences when the object of such offences was to secure the ultimate unity of the country. That confirms what has long been the practical outcome of the decisions of the Irish courts.

If the Minister will refer to questions on extradition that I have asked down the years, and to the answers given by his right hon. and hon. Friends and by himself, he will see that between 1971 and 1987, the Irish Republic made 159 requests to Northern Ireland for extraditions. Only two were refused. One hundred and seventeen were granted, and 49—just under three per year—were not granted for various reasons. Over the same period, extradition requests made by Northern Ireland numbered 411. Fifty-seven of those were refused, 118 were granted, and 237 were not granted—presumably because the suspects were either in prison or could not be found. Another parliamentary answer confirmed that between 1971 and 1989, 110 people were extradited for non-terrorist offences from the Republic to Northern Ireland, and only seven for terrorist offences. Those figures tell it all.

Where does that leave the people who formulated, signed, welcomed and defended—and still defend—the agreement of 15 November 1985? The hope of extraditions has been exposed for the shabby, bloody deception that it was. The figures reveal the spider's web into which this nation's leaders wandered, against every word of advice offered by the Members of Parliament who sit on this Bench. Those figures are proof of the fruits of the 1987 Act and of previous legislation. The evil consequences of the Anglo-Irish Agreement are only now beginning to blossom, and will continue to do so in a dreadful fashion over the next few years.

The two Irish Supreme Court decisions—the second growing out of the McGimpsey case—mean that those who have murdered, bombed, maimed and destroyed will never be extradited. An excuse will always be found by the Republic for not doing so, not least because its constitution does not recognise the validity of the extradition provisions. There is no way that the Irish courts can ever permit extraditions, because they do not acknowledge the existence in law of Northern Ireland. It is not going too far to say that extradition to Ulster from the Irish Republic could be deemed by the Republic as unconstitutional. I have listened carefully to the Government over the past few weeks, and their words show that they are still fogbound or lost in a time warp some time before the McGimpsey, Finucane and Clarke cases. But Ministers are far too clever and well advised by the Law Officers of the Crown and by their own officials to really be so lost. My belief is that the Government realise how much things have gone wrong.

What will the Government do about that? Will they allow murder to continue in Ulster? Will they go on shutting their eyes to the real world of terrorism that contaminates our land and blights our lives? Will they for ever close their ears to the counselling they receive from these Benches and from others, when ignoring it has led them into the bog in which they now find themselves? The Government know what must be done, and they know how to do it. Will they make a start? The Irish Republic, because of its written constitution, is frozen in its attitude and will never or can never deliver on the recognition of Ulster or the extradition of those who pursue the concept of a united Ireland through violence.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): I congratulate the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) on obtaining this Adjournment debate on a subject that is both complex and important. Extradition is a vital weapon in the fight against crime of any sort, be it of terrorist or non-terrorist.

I do not question that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House are united in the desire to see terrorist offenders in particular brought to justice. That having been said, extradition is a matter fraught both with practical and political difficulties, and any failure of the system is given a far higher profile than are the successes that are achieved.

The hon. Gentleman's first concern, rightly, is with the recent cases of Finucane and Clarke, in which the Irish Supreme Court refused extradition to Northern Ireland. I will return to those cases shortly. Before I do so, the House may find it helpful if I say a few words about the mechanics of the system.

Extradition is an arrangement designed to prevent criminals escaping justice by crossing national frontiers, and it therefore plays an integral part in the criminal justice process of modern states. Extradition between the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom is operated under a system known as the backing of warrants. This arrangement does not for the most part involve the two Governments but is operated on a police-to-police basis. The original and underlying premise of the system is that the two jurisdictions are sufficiently close, in terms of the workings of their criminal justice systems, for a warrant issued in one country to be acceptable in the other, without the full extradition proceedings that either would require of a third country.

The procedure is, at least in principle, relatively simple. Despite the apparent simplicity, however, almost all cases now involve lengthy appeals, the outcome of which has been, and remains, unpredictable. Any individual case can throw up difficulties on a number of levels, but, broadly speaking, there are three categories of difficulty—administrative, legal, and political.

On the administrative side, the mechanics of processing a request involve a number of different agencies in both the requesting and requested states and co-ordination is thus complex. In past cases, problems have arisen over the immensely detailed scrutiny which the Irish courts have applied in the United Kingdom warrants. A good deal of work by lawyers skilled in this specialist field is often required. We believe that the resulting problems have now largely been solved as a result of a considerable investment of effort by the authorities on both sides, and the production of a detailed checklist.

[Dr. Brian Mawhinney]

So far as extradition between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland is concerned, there are two particular problems which have figured largely in recent cases. One is the provision of the Irish constitution which requires the Irish courts to protect Irish citizens from the threat of attack to their life, liberty, or property. That provision is the key on which fugitives have hung defences against extradition based on the argument that their life, person or property will be liable to attack if they are returned.

The second problem which commonly arises is where the defence case rests on the claim that the offence in question was political. That is a particularly sensitive issue in requests for fugitives to be returned to Northern Ireland. Close examination is made by defence lawyers of political issues in Northern Ireland which can be used to seek to justify fugitives' assertions that their offences were legitimately politically motivated. Extradition hearings have often, in the past, turned into debates on Irish history and political conditions in the Province, and the fairness of the administration of justice in Northern Ireland is often put unfairly under the microscope.

The backing of warrants system is a most important means of bringing to justice terrorist offenders who have escaped to the Republic, not least because it is right in principle that, whenever possible, fugitive offenders should be brought to justice in the jurisdiction where their crimes are committed. However, we do have provisions in our law, and in Irish law, whereby persons charged with the commission of certain serious crimes in Northern Ireland can be tried in the Republic, and vice versa. To date, 12 persons have been convicted in the Republic for crimes committed in Northern Ireland, and three acquitted. Four persons have been convicted in Northern Ireland for crimes committed in the Republic.

Let me turn to specifics. Our utter dismay, bordering on disbelief, at the widely reported decisions of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Ireland not to return to Northern Ireland two convicted terrorists is a matter of public record. I shall return to them shortly. First, however, I should like to set them against the background of the generally improved working of extradition arrangements in recent times.

Since January 1988, 14 persons have been returned to the United Kingdom. A further seven persons are currently before the Irish courts. Of those 14 returned, three were returned to Northern Ireland in connection with terrorist-related offences, two of whom were Maze escapers. One further person was returned to Northern Ireland for a non-terrorist offence.

As far as Dermot Finucane and James Clarke are concerned, both men were convicted in Northern Ireland of serious terrorist offences: Finucane was serving 18 years for possession of firearms and ammunition and Clarke 18 years for the attempted murder of a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment. The lengths of those sentences speak for themselves; people are not sentenced to 18 years for trivial misdemeanours. Both were involved in the mass break-out from the Maze prison in 1983. They were subsequently arrested in the Republic where the district court made orders for their extradition.

Appeals on behalf of both men were quashed by the High Court in the Republic. They were, however, upheld on 13 March in the Supreme Court, their last court of appeal. As a result, these two convicted terrorists are now at large in the Republic. That was a judicial decision, but I, like many members of this House, and many people throughout the country, find it baffling and deplorable. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, among others, has made those feelings very clear. That dismay was also expressed by some in the Republic of Ireland.

The judgments were lengthy and complex and are still being studied closely. Their full implications for future cases may become clear only in the light of experience. In both the Finucane and Clarke cases, the Supreme Court found that extradition should be refused on the ground that the men's constitutional rights might be breached if returned because of what the court called a "probable risk" that they would be assaulted on return to the Maze. In addition, it was found that Finucane, but not Clarke, was entitled to take advantage of the political offence exception.

The slur cast on the professionalism of the Northern Ireland prison service by the first of those findings is deeply offensive and wholly unjustifiable. I believe firmly that the prison regime offered in Northern Ireland is both innovative and constructive, administered by dedicated, trained, and professional staff providing a service of which we can all be proud.

No one who has been returned to Northern Ireland, whether from the Republic or elsewhere, has subsequently taken any sort of action alleging physical ill-treatment in prison. I do not for a moment believe that had Finucane and Clarke been returned they would have suffered such ill-treatment; nor, I believe, does anyone else who knows anything of the present Northern Ireland prison system. It is the Government's view that the Supreme Court's opinion in this part of its judgment is completely unjustified on the known facts about today's prison regime.

What is even more disturbing, however, is the Supreme Court's acceptance in Finucane's case that he was entitled to lay claim to the political offence exception. The implications of that finding are extremely serious and could, potentially, affect future cases.

I shall not rehearse the history of the political offence exception in extradition from the Republic of Ireland to the United Kingdom. It is in some respects a sorry story, but I believe that, before those judgments, we had reached a position where those sought for terrorist crimes in Northern Ireland could lay claim to the political offence exception only with difficulty. The judgments have now rolled back from that position. They are a step in a very unhelpful and regrettable direction, following on from some previous very positive moves in the Republic.

The hon. Gentleman referred several times to the Anglo-Irish Agreement, and he rightly pointed out that following this debate there will be a debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). Like him, I do not wish to trespass into the territory of that debate, but I must make one or two comments because the hon. Member for Londonderry, East, raised the issue and because they are relevant to the question of extradition. Since the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, we have made progress on extradition. We are pleased with that, but we cannot be satisfied with things as they are.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): The hon. Gentleman has made a statement that I do not understand.

He has said that, since the signing of the Anglo-Eire agreement, the Government have made progress with Dublin on extradition. Surely, however, the rules were changed by the Dublin Government after the signing of the Anglo-Eire agreement, to the detriment of ease of extradition.

Dr. Mawhinney: The hon. Member for Londonderry, East made a similar point and quoted my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but things have improved. Arrangements have been brought up to date in a way that has made it easier to pursue the extradition process, not least in terms of what I said earlier about the detailed arrangements that now exist. However, my hon. Friend will have heard me say just before he rose to his feet that I am not satisfied with things as they are—nor are the Government.

We shall be pursuing urgently with the Government of the Republic of Ireland our concern that the system as a whole should work effectively. I do not underrate the difficulties caused by these recent cases, but by close co-operation with the Irish Government we must find ways to overcome them.

The Anglo-Irish Agreement was never an agreement to agree about everything, but it does offer a framework for discussion of such matters. The agreement provided a firm framework for our discussions with the Irish Government about ratification of the European convention on the suppression of terrorism, without which we would now be in a much worse position than we are today. It will also provide a framework for our future exchanges with the Irish Government about the implications of the Finucane and Clarke judgments and the urgent action which needs to be taken in consequence of those judgments. These functions are vital.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): During the discussions with the Irish Government under the auspices of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, will the Government also be pursuing the need to extend the role played by the Criminal Law Jurisdiction Act? According to the figures that the Minister has given, in so far as it has operated it has been reasonably successful.

Dr. Mawhinney: The hon. Gentleman knows that that Act is one of a number of ways in which we can consider these various matters and seek to make progress. It is a consideration in each of the cases. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will certainly bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's comments during the conference meetings. I shall specifically draw them to his attention.

Let me finish by reiterating how important extradition is. Both the British and the Irish Governments have pledged themselves to ensure that effective arrangements are in place for dealing with fugitive offenders. Extradition is a vital factor in this. The importance attached to it by the Irish authorities is easily demonstrated. It was they who originally sought the extraditions of Finucane and Clarke on our behalf and who continued to make strenuous efforts, throughout their judicial system, to bring the cases to a successful conclusion.

Convicted terrorists and those facing charges for terrorist offences must not be allowed to take refuge from justice in any civilised country. I believe it to be self-evident that people of good will throughout the world should regard terrorists as their common enemy, as we do, and should be committed to take whatever steps may be necessary to bring them to justice. That truism alone must give all right-thinking British and Irish people cause for concern at the present position on extradition in the Irish Republic. But, further to that, the Irish Government are committed in the context of the agreement, and particularly in the context of the recent review, to ensuring, with us, fair and effective extradition arrangements between our two countries. We will strive, with them, to ensure that such arrangements are brought about in future.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

10.14 am

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Apart from the Republic of Argentina, which lays claim to part of Her Majesty's dominions—what it describes as the Malvinas—the only other country which lays claim to any part of Her Majesty's dominions is the Republic of Ireland. That was highlighted in the debate to which he have just listened.

I want to remind the House of the terms of articles 2 and 3 of the Republic's constitution. Article 2 says:

> "The national territory consists of the whole island of Ireland, its islands and the territorial seas."

Article 3 says:

> "Pending the re-integration of the national territory, and without prejudice to the right of the Parliament and Government established by this Constitution . . . the laws enacted by that Parliament shall have the like area and extent of application".

In the McGimpsey judgment, given in the Irish Supreme Court last month, these words appeared:

> "The reintegration of the national territory is a constitutional imperative."

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in Dublin to refuse the request for extradition followed after the judgment in the McGimpsey case. Many who are expert in the law of the Republic of Ireland believe that the decision to refuse to grant extradition—not in the case of two suspected terrorists but in the case of two convicted terrorists—depended to a substantial degree on the earlier judgment in the McGimpsey case.

It was possible because my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had in mind the profoundly objectionable terms of articles 2 and 3 of the Irish constitution that she said in this place:

> "no commitment exists for Her Majesty's Government to consult the Irish Government on matters affecting Northern Ireland. That has always been our position. We reiterate and emphasise it, so that everyone is clear about it."—[Official Report, 29 July 1982; Vol. 28, c. 1226.]

On 17 May 1984, again speaking in this place, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

> "The constitutional future of Northern Ireland is a matter for Northern Ireland and this Parliament, and for no one else."—[Official Report, 17 May 1984; Vol. 60, c. 503.]

However, the year after that last quotation appeared in the Official Report on 17 May 1984, the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed. That agreement gave to the Government of the Irish Republic—to the Government of the only country whose constitution laid claim to Northern Ireland—the right to put forward views and proposals about how Northern Ireland was to be governed and laid upon Her Majesty's Government an obligation, if they disagreed with those views and proposals, to make determined efforts to resolve differences.

The Anglo-Irish Agreement specifically said that the Government of the Irish Republic were there to represent nationalists. You know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that four nationalists have been elected to this Parliament. Three of them have taken their seats. The proper people to represent nationalists in dealings with Her Majesty's Ministers are those who have been elected to this place, and not the Government of a foreign power. To confer upon the Irish Republic responsibility for the representation of some of Her Majesty's subjects when those subjects have at least in this respect an equal right with all other of Her Majesty's subjects to elect their own representatives, was intensely divisive.

If right hon. and hon. Members think that I am going too far when I say that Her Majesty's Government accepted that the Government of the Irish Republic were to represent nationalists, article 4 of the agreement, states:

> "The Conference shall be a framework within which the Irish Government may put forward views and proposals on the modalities of bringing about devolution in Northern Ireland in so far as they relate to the interests of the minority community."

I shall return to article 4 later in my speech.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Surely what the hon. Gentleman said about the Irish Government representing only nationalists is the only position that that Government could take, as their Supreme Court has clarified the matter. We can all see the reasoning behind it, which was that they have a legal claim to Northern Ireland and a constitutional imperative to pursue the objective of a united Ireland. As Unionists object to that, there is no way in which the Irish Government could legally, within their own constitution, represent a Unionist viewpoint.

Mr. Gow: I agree entirely.

There are some Members of Parliament, among whom I am not to be included, who believe that Her Majesty's Government entered into the Anglo-Irish Agreement in something other than good faith. I have never doubted the good faith of Her Majesty's Government or of the Government of the Irish Republic in entering into the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Despite the words of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister which I read to the House, I believe that she, above all people, was appalled, as we all were, by the continuing violence in Northern Ireland and that she, above all, was mindful of the misery caused to wives who were turned into widows and children who were turned into orphans. She was as appalled as any Member of Parliament by the misery caused by the terror, by the continuing division between the communities in the Province, and by the fact that at that time unemployment in Northern Ireland was worse than in any other part of the United Kingdom. She and Her Majesty's Ministers wished genuinely, sincerely and honourably to redress those evils in Northern Ireland. They really believed that the agreement would bring the Province peace, stability and reconciliation. To my deep regret, I was not able to share that belief, but of course the Government believed that the Anglo-Irish Agreement would be acceptable to nationalists.

The Foreign Office, which was the principal Department involved in the protracted negotiations, advised the Government that the agreement would be welcomed in Dublin, in the Vatican, in Roman Catholic Europe, and, above all, in Washington, where it was believed that the signing of the agreement would lead to a diminution of financial and material support for terrorist organisations in the Province. Of course, when they heard that that agreement, if signed along the lines of the final draft, would be widely welcomed and would restore the confidence of the nationalists, Her Majesty's Ministers asked one other question. They said, "You have told us how pleased all these other people will be and how the capitals of Europe and even the most important capital of all, Washington, would be pleased, but what will be the reaction of Unionists?"

That is where the Government were so badly advised. They were given the answer, "Paisley will huff and puff, but on the whole Unionists will be well satisfied with the agreement." The argument ran that the Unionists would be well satisfied because, it was claimed, quite wrongly, that the Irish Government had acknowledged for the first time in article 1 of the agreement that there could be a change in the status of Northern Ireland only if a majority of the people of Northern Ireland wanted it.

However, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will recall the opening words of the Sunningdale communiqué in 1974. For the sake of accuracy, I have a copy of the text of the declaration made at Sunningdale in 1974, 11 years before the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed. It stated:

> "The Irish Government fully accepted and solemnly declared that there could be no change in the status of Northern Ireland until a majority of the people of Northern Ireland desired a change in that status."

The British Cabinet genuinely believed when it sanctioned the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement that the Republic had taken a great new step forward in acknowledging that for the first time. But it was not so.

The second reason why it was claimed that the Unionists ought to be well satisfied with the agreement was that it would lead to a new era of co-operation in the defeat of terrorism between the Government of the Irish Republic and Her Majesty's Government and between the Garda and the Royal Ulster Constabulary. But the Anglo-Irish Agreement was not necessary to secure co-operation in the defeat of terrorism.

There is no such agreement between France and Spain whereby France is allowed to put forward views and proposals on how the Basque country should be governed. That is not necessary to secure co-operation between Spain and France in the defeat of terrorism. Relations between France and the United Kingdom, in regard to anti-terrorist measures, could not possibly be better, happier, or more effective, and we are able to achieve that without giving France the right to propose how Alderney, Sark or Jersey should be governed.

It is a myth to say that a precondition of co-operation was the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. If that were the reality, and if the Republic had told Her Majesty's Government that they would co-operate only if they were given the right to put forward views and proposals about how part of the United Kingdom should be governed, that would be the most massive indictment of the honour, integrity and commitment of the Government of the Irish Republic to ending violence.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State looks puzzled at my assertion that that was the advice given to the Cabinet. He has no need to take my word for it. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave an interview to the Belfast Telegraph just five weeks after the agreement was signed. For the sake of accuracy, I have a copy of the interview which she gave to Mr. Desmond McCartan. She was asked about the reaction of the Unionists to the agreement, and she replied:

> "the reaction has been much worse than I expected. One is trying to find out why."

She did not say that the reaction has been "worse than I expected", but "much worse".

The Prime Minister said that she was trying to find out why. What does that mean? It means that the Prime Minister was told that the reaction of Unionists would be one of support, whereas it turned out to be one of hostility. The Prime Minister and the Cabinet had been misled and had not been properly advised. We can readily understand why that was. The Government of the Irish Republic had taken the SDLP into their confidence, but Her Majesty's Government had had no discussions with Unionists beforehand, although anyone with the slightest knowledge of Northern Ireland would not have had to have discussions with Unionist Members to know the views of the people of Northern Ireland.

The way in which the Anglo-Irish Agreement is viewed by the overwhelming majority of people in Northern Ireland in April 1990 is no more favourable than it was on 15 November 1985. There is a sense of disbelief that we could confer that place of special privilege on the Government of the Irish Republic, whose constitution still lays claim to Northern Ireland; a sense of disbelief that we should ask another Government to represent some of Her Majesty's subjects when those subjects have the right to elect their own Members.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that the Irish Government are enabled to represent the nationalist community in the north implies that Her Majesty's Government do not seem to feel able sufficiently to represent the interests of those citizens of the United Kingdom in a way that is fair and even-handed in relation to other United Kingdom citizens?

Mr. Gow: When dealing with any of the four countries that make up the United Kingdom, Her Majesty's Government have a duty to take account of the interests of all of the people in each of those four countries. For example, the Secretary of State for Scotland must ensure that, in the administration of Scotland, nationalists, socialists, liberals and those who, like myself, believe in the Union are all governed under a fair and just law. He must ensure that each citizen, whatever his or her political or religious beliefs, shall be treated in the same way under a just law.

It is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to safeguard and protect nationalists—and republicans—in Northern Ireland. I am wholly opposed at all times, and in all circumstances, to any discrimination in Northern Ireland on the ground that a citizen is a Roman Catholic, a nationalist or a republican. I shall make only one caveat: that nationalists in Northern Ireland, whom I acknowledge, honour and respect, must accept their responsibility to behave as responsible citizens, obeying the law at all times. That means doing their utmost to defeat terrorism. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) that the Government in every part of the kingdom must protect all their citizens, whatever their views, under a just law.

The Anglo-Irish Agreement did not get off to a happy start, because it was in two versions—the Irish text and the United Kingdom text. The Irish text did not refer to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. That is not very surprising, in view of recent judgments from the Supreme Court, and in view of articles 2 and 3. It was not a happy start to a solemn treaty and agreement when the texts did not coincide.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary on the robust reply that he gave to the previous debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross). The words that fell from his lips were carefully fashioned—and were approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. His description of the judgments of the Supreme Court was "baffling and deplorable", and I agree entirely with that choice of words.

[Mr. Gow]

However, my hon. Friend's efforts, and those of the Government, to secure much better—indeed, proper—extradition arrangements will be wished godspeed by every hon. Member. It is a terrible commentary on the evils of terrorism that on a supposedly friendly country, with whose Government we have entered into a treaty, should be conferred a special provision which means that that country above all others—a country that has suffered from terrorism—is now perceived, with justification, to be a safe haven for terrorists.

In the cases of Finucane and Clarke, we are referring not to suspected terrorists but to people who were convicted of grave terrorist crimes. During their escape from the Maze prison, further grave crimes were committed. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will accept that it is not impossible that those two, whose extradition was refused, will now engage in further terrorist activity, and that is greatly to be deplored.

No one who believes that the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement will fail to bring to the Province that peace, stability and reconciliation that we all want to see, and no one who is critical of the agreement, should criticise it without offering an alternative. Clearly the agreement can be changed or amended at any time with the consent of both parties. If my right hon. Friend the Minister of State makes an agreement with my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury, however solemn its terms—whether it is registered with the Comptroller of the Household, the United Nations, Mr. Delors or anyone who is now in fashion—it can be altered at the request of the two parties who made it.

I have submitted to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and to the then Foreign Secretary—now Lord President of the Council—the text of a revised Anglo-Irish Agreement. When my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Northern Ireland arrived at Stormont or Hillsborough, he also was a beneficiary—I am not sure whether he regarded it in those terms—as I sent him the text of my alternative to the Anglo-Irish Agreement. That alternative could have been fashioned with the consent of the two contracting Governments. The revised agreement did not give the Republic the right to advance views and proposals about how one part of the kingdom was governed—or, as article 4 says, the right to put forward proposals on behalf of nationalists as to what form of devolution there should be. It envisaged something that had been fashioned earlier by the Conservative and Unionist party.

Shortly after my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was elected leader of the Conservative party on 11 February 1975, she appointed as shadow Secretary of State her friend and mine Airey Neave, who held the post from February 1975 until he was assassinated in the precincts of this House on 30 March 1979. Just before he was assassinated, the shadow Cabinet had agreed—you, Madam Deputy Speaker, will not be surprised to learn that it had done so without much discussion—the Conservative party's policies for Northern Ireland. The manifesto stated:

> "In the absence of devolved Government, we shall seek to set up a regional council or councils with widely devolved powers over local matters."

I am still waiting for Ministers to implement the policy that had been fashioned by Airey Neave with the consent and concurrence of the leader of the Ulster Unionist party and, if I am allowed to say this without any presumption, with the concurrence of the hon. Member for Eastbourne.

We are still awaiting the implementation of that policy. The conclusion that Airey Neave had reached in his four years of stewardship as shadow Secretary of State was that the least dangerous and most hopeful way forward was to treat Northern Ireland as closely as possible to the way that we treat the rest of the United Kingdom. That did not mean identical treatment, because England, Wales and Scotland are governed differently, but it recognised the most important truth that the House can learn—that the most important factor in prolonging terrorism in Northern Ireland is uncertainty about the constitutional future of the Province. Ministers have not yet understood that truth.

The uncertainty about Ulster's constitutional future was not diminished but increased by the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. The certainty about Ulster's constitutional future has not been increased by the two judgments in the Supreme Court in Dublin last month; it is the uncertainty that has been increased by those judgments.

It is perfectly possible, despite the commitment in article 4, for Ministers to confer modest additional powers on the 26 district councils in Northern Ireland. Dublin would not like us doing so, but we do not need its consent. Nothing prevents my right hon. Friend the Minister of State from trying to set up a regional council in Northern Ireland with some of the powers enjoyed by regional councils in Scotland and county councils in England and Wales. Nothing stops him bringing to an end the absurdity that we legislate for 1·5 million of the Queen's subjects in Northern Ireland by unamendable Order in Council, which we would not accept for our constituents.

Sometimes, the policy that I am advocating is described as integration. It could perfectly properly be described as administrative devolution. The time will come when Ministers realise that the surest protection for the minority and the greatest guarantee of stability in Northern Ireland is to adopt that policy, of which the late Airey Neave was the principal architect. The sooner we do so, the greater will be the prospect of peace, stability and reconciliation which all decent men want to see.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. John Cope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) on securing this debate and on the manner in which he has pursued and promoted his views on the subject since his resignation, which I much respected, from the Government. In diverging from my hon. Friend, as I will, he knows that I have every respect for his parliamentary and political manners. Once again, he clearly set out his views. I observed that he dwelt a little more on the past of the agreement. The debate was advertised as being about the future of the agreement, but I read from one to the other.

Mr. William Ross: Has it a future?

Mr. Cope: Perhaps that was the point that my hon. Friend was making.

It is my task to make it clear that the Government remain committed to the Anglo-Irish Agreement and to the principles that underline it and are embodied in it. The agreement was intended to address how the legitimate interests of the Irish Government in matters within Northern Ireland, particularly regarding the minority community, could be acknowledged without diluting United Kingdom sovereignty or the status of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom. In his closing remarks, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne demonstrated the sovereignty of Parliament and the Government's advice to it on various matters.

More important, article 1 of the agreement provides a formal acknowledgement by both Governments of the factual status of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom; that that status would be changed only if and when a majority of the people of Northern Ireland wished it; and that if that should occur, both Governments would facilitate it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) said in the House on 14 March in replying to an Adjournment debate, that firm bedrock has not been shaken by the McGimpsey judgment.

The agreement provides a structure in which views and proposals can be put forward by the Irish Government, in particular in the absence of a devolved Government, and a framework in which the differences that inevitably arise between us from time to time can be resolved in a constructive and co-operative fashion, with the minimum, although not always with the absence, of acrimony. Such differences are inevitable and it is better to try to resolve them through such a framework.

I hope that all hon. Members will agree that a close relationship with the Irish Republic, as provided by the agreement, is an essential component of our efforts to ensure that terrorism does not succeed in Northern Ireland. This morning's earlier discussion on extradition emphasised that point.

The conference, supported by the secretariat, has provided the forum in which Ministers and senior officials on both sides can maintain close and frequent contact. That has inevitably given each side a greater awareness of the political and other realities against which the other side has to operate and has helped to reduce the risk of misunderstandings arising over particular incidents and has increased the possibility that problems will be resolved in a constructive and co-operative spirit. It has enabled each side to take decisions within its jurisdiction with greater knowledge and awareness of the likely impact on and reactions of the other side. That does not mean that we do not disagree with out Irish colleagues on some issues, but it does mean that we have a way of trying to resolve them.

The agreement has been, and continues to be, widely welcomed internationally, where it has been recognised as making a very positive contribution to addressing the fundamental problems of Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friend has criticised the agreement again today, because it treats Northern Ireland differently from the rest of the United Kingdom. However, we must recognise that, in Northern Ireland there are two distinct communities and that in that sense, it is not like any other part of the United Kingdom. The two communities have different aspirations, traditions and allegiances. There is, regrettably, as the House knows all too well, a history of animosity and conflict between them. The agreement provides a means of giving recognition to the identities of the two communities in a framework that ensures that the wishes of a majority shall prevail. Their wishes are, of course, that Northern Ireland should remain part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. William Ross: The Minister is now talking about the interests of the majority. Does he remember that, a moment ago, he was talking about the input of the Government of the Irish Republic? Will he, on behalf of the Government, now give the House an assurance that, on all future occasions when Ministers happen to be speaking to the Government of the Irish Republic, they will keep firmly in the forefront of their mind the fact that the Government of the Irish Republic have been instructed by their own Supreme Court that at every opportunity they must pursue the objective of a united Ireland and use whatever constitutional or other means are available at the time?

Mr. Cope: In seeking to balance the interests of the majority and those of the minority on different occasions, which it is our responsibility to do, we try to keep in mind all relevant considerations, including the views of the Irish Government and the factors that may have led them to present those views to us.

For the avoidance of doubt, I should just add that it is my wish also that Northern Ireland should remain a part of the United Kingdom. I hope that it does, but it is the wish of a majority of the people of Northern Ireland rather than my own wish which matters and should be paramount, as the agreement recognises.

In addition to enshrining the principle of consent as the basis for determining the future of Northern Ireland, the agreement has provided a valuable forum in which cross-border co-operation in security and other matters can be pursued. There is absolutely no doubt that close co-operation in security is essential to our efforts to defeat terrorism. Nor is there any doubt that there have been improvements since the signing of the agreement, and there is now a much more effective level of co-operation between the two police forces. However, there is no room for complacency and I do not say that all is perfect. There remains much work to be done at the political level to ensure that security co-operation is as effective as it can be. The advantage of the agreement is that it provides us with the mechanism through which the two Governments' shared interest in bringing terrorism to an end can be advanced.

The British Government have always made it clear, of course, that they do not regard the agreement as a panacea which provides the solution to all Northern Ireland's problems. Although, as I have said, it provides a valuable framework in which relations between the two Governments on Northern Ireland matters can be conducted, we do not regard it as immutable or as incapable of improvement.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does the Minister agree that, apart from the co-operation between Ministers in the Irish Republic and in the United Kingdom, which I fully endorse, there is a strong case for continuing co-operation, now that it has started, between Members of Paliament in the Republic and those in this country? Like the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter), I participated in the first session of the new British parliamentary body. I look on that as a welcome initiative. Does the Minister agree?

Mr. Cope: It is a helpful development. A review of the working of the Anglo-Irish Conference——

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): I appreciate that the Minister has a full speech there in justification of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. He has stated that the agreement has provided great benefits to the people of the United Kingdom—forgetting the Irish Republic at present. We had good relations with Dublin over security and there was a degree of co-operation. If anything, it has worsened since the signing of the agreement. Will the Minister now list the benefits that have accrued to the United Kingdom as a result of signing the agreement?

Mr. Cope: I have already given my opinion, which is that benefits have accrued in security co-operation, and I shall talk about some of the other ways in which I believe benefits have accrued and in which co-operation has improved.

A review of the working of the intergovernmental conference, as prescribed under article 11 of the agreement, was completed in May last year. The communiqué recording the outcome of that review and a document setting out developments that have taken place since the signing of the agreement are available in the Library of the House. The two Governments reaffirmed, in paragraph 27 of the review communiqué, the fundamental objectives of the agreement in promoting peace and stability in Northern Ireland, diminishing the divisions between the two traditions, creating a new climate of friendship and co-operation between them and improving co-operation in combating terrorism.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cope: No, as I have given way several times.

The two Governments concluded at that stage that the conference had proved its value and that no fundamental change was necessary in its role. They also agreed that if in future it were to appear that the objectives of the agreement could be more effectively served by changes in the scope and nature of the working of the conference, they would be ready in principle to consider such changes. That is relevant to one of the fundamental provisions of the agreement, article 4, to which hon. Members have already referred, which refers to the British Government's policy—which has the support of the Irish Government, too—that responsibility in respect of certain matters within the powers of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland should be devolved within Northern Ireland on a basis that would secure widespread acceptance throughout the community.

It remains the Government's view that it is desirable for locally elected representatives in Northern Ireland to have a greater say in the decisions that affect the lives of the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Barry Porter: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cope: No, as I have given way several times.

In order for this to happen, it is essential for dialogue to take place between the Northern Ireland political parties and with the British Government. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has, as the House knows, been having a series of meetings with Northern Ireland political leaders to explore what scope there is for making progress.

The judgment of the Irish Supreme Court in the McGimpsey case should not be allowed to block the path to political progress in Northern Ireland. We are offering talks on political progress without preconditions. Unionists may, therefore, legitimately seek change in articles 2 and 3 of the Irish constitution as part of their list of objectives to be achieved from any talks. I draw their attention to a speech made by an Irish Minister in the debate in the Irish Senate on the McGimpsey judgment, in which he did not say that the Irish would never change their constitution, but said that they did not want to change it in a vacuum and that they would be prepared to examine and review the articles in the context of new political arrangements that might emerge in these islands. Few would doubt that the amendment of articles 2 and 3 of that constitution would have a most important and positive effect on the atmosphere within Northern Ireland and on relations between the Republic and the United Kingdom.

There can be differing views about the form and extent of any devolution of powers, but there appears to be common recognition that devolution is the basis on which widespread acceptance is most likely to be achieved and that both sides of the community must play a proper role in any future institutions of government in Northern Ireland. The achievement of devolution on a basis that will secure widespread acceptance is a central part of the agenda set by the agreement. That does not mean devolution within the agreement, but it does mean that we look to the Irish Government to support our efforts to facilitate the process. As any political progress within Northern Ireland will have implications for relations with the Republic of Ireland, we have kept in close touch with the Irish Government about ways in which progress might be achieved. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to meet his Irish co-chairman of the conference again in the near future to continue that discussion.

The British Government hold fast to the view that a close and co-operative relationship with the Republic of Ireland is essential. For our part, we shall seek to sustain and develop the relationship. Equally, we shall seek to heal any damage to the relationship caused by external factors and to resolve disagreements between the two Governments in an amicable, if sometimes forthright, manner.

It being Eleven o'clock MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Resolution [16 March].

Strangeways Prison

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Waddington): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I think that I ought to make a further statement to the House about the serious events at Manchester prison over the past few days before we rise for the Easter recess.

Since I reported to the House last Monday, prison staff have continued progressively to regain control of the buildings. During the same period, a large number of prisoners have surrendered. But 12 prisoners can be seen inside the prison, who have been identified by name. Pending a final check of our records, I cannot say whether there might not be more.

Negotiations are continuing in order to bring this appalling incident to a close, and I know that the governor and his staff, who throughout have conducted themselves with great courage and professionalism, will continue to do so. I should also like to thank the police and the fire and ambulance services for the work that they have done.

I am very sorry to have to inform the House that a Manchester prison officer died in hospital this morning. He had been on duty on Sunday 1 April, and, although he suffered no injuries during the disturbance, he was admitted to hospital later that day. I wish to express my deep sympathy to his family in their loss. The House will already be aware that a remand prisoner, Mr. Derek White, who suffered serious injuries in the course of the events of last Sunday and who was admitted to hospital on that day, died as a result of those injuries on 3 April. Again, I offer my sympathy to his relatives.

During the past few days a number of prison officers have also been injured, but all but one have now been discharged from hospital.

The Greater Manchester police have opened a murder inquiry, following the death of Mr. White, and other criminal investigations into the incident.

A special telephone number for the use of relatives concerned as to the whereabouts of individual prisoners in Manchester prison at the start of the incident has been available since Sunday. It is 061-817 8178. All governors receiving prisoners from Manchester have also been asked to enable them to make a telephone call to a relative or friend without charge.

Urgent consideration is also being given to the new arrangements which will need to be made to accommodate people committed from the courts in the Manchester area.

I have already expressed my intention to set up an inquiry into this incident as soon as it has been resolved. It will be conducted by Lord Justice Woolf. The terms of reference will be to inquire into the events leading up to the serious disturbance in Her Majesty's prison, Manchester and the action taken to bring it to a conclusion. I intend that the report, which will be separate from, and will not conflict with, the criminal investigation, should be published.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I express my thanks to the Home Secretary for making his statement. I know that he had rightly hoped to make it after the riot had ended, but it is absolutely correct that he should come and tell the House how things stand on this, our last sitting day before Easter.

Once more, I expressed our gratitude to, and admiration for, the police, fire officers, ambulance staff and prison officers who have risked their lives and safety in Strangeways this week. I offer our condolences to the family of the prison officer whose tragic death the Home Secretary has just reported and to the family of the inmate who died. The fact that the dead prisoner was on remand awaiting trial, and therefore innocent before the law, adds to the tragedy of his death.

The Home Secretary has told us nothing about the reported disturbances in other prisons. Has he anything that he feels he should tell the House on that subject?

I welcome the right hon. and learned Gentleman's announcement that an inquiry is to be set up. Today, I want to do no more than to ask the Home Secretary for assurances about the issues that the inquiry will consider. The Home Secretary will know that both the Prison Officers Association and the Prison Governors Association attribute the extent of the riot to understaffing. The prison governors have been explicit in relating the riot to what they call

"taut staffing levels . . . since the introduction of Fresh Start".

May we be assured that the inquiry will be empowered to make a wide-ranging examination of staffing levels?

The Home Secretary will recall that last Monday I asked him about the warnings of riots in Strangeways and he told the House that no significant warnings had been received. Reports continue of warnings which, at least to the layman, appear to have been significant, and recklessly ignored. May we again be assured that the inquiry will examine the significance of the alleged warnings and the appropriateness of the authorities' reaction to them?

I make no comment and ask no question about operational matters as the siege continues and none of us wishes to do anything that might prevent its speedy resolution, but will the inquiry examine the general principle of containment, rather than forcible entry, on occasions such as this, especially given that it is reported that inside the prison a number of prisoners are being assaulted and other criminal acts are therefore taking place? Perhaps the Home Secretary does not want to comment even in the most oblique way on the subject this morning, in which case I shall understand the absence of an answer, but I hope that the inquiry will examine the principle, because there is great concern throughout the country that bestial and appalling acts are going on inside the prison and the thought of stopping them immediately ought to be in the public mind and under public examination.

Mr. Waddington: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the thanks that he expressed to all those who have had to carry a heavy burden in the past few days and who have performed magnificently. I am grateful also for the condolences that he expressed to the families of the prison officer who died and the prisoner who died.

I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that the disturbances that broke out at other prisons are not continuing.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the terms of reference of the inquiry. Of course, it will be up to Lord Justice Woolf to interpret the terms of reference, but he will be concerned to deal with the events leading up to the disturbances and also with the way in which the problem was tackled once those disturbances broke out.

On the question of the reports of warnings, I advise the House and those listening outside to leave these matters now to Lord Justice Woolf. I hope that hon. Members and others will put any evidence in their possession before

[Mr. Waddington]

Lord Justice Woolf. It is far better that it should be done in that way rather than that reports of one sort or another should be leaked to the press.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): May I, in turn, offer my sincere condolences to the bereaved families in this awful affair? It is estimated that prison officers have recaptured more than 50 per cent. of the prisoners. If that is so, surely they must have witnessed signs of the barbaric scenes that have been described, especially in the tabloid press. Will the Home Secretary comment on that?

Mr. Waddington: The prison officers at Strangeways have not seen the result of any barbaric acts. What we do know is that violence must have occurred on the very first day because violence was done to one prisoner, who, unhappily, has since died. I cannot invite anyone in the House to accept a picture of violence occurring since then. Certainly there have been no macabr[illegible]iscoveries by prison officers during the past few days.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is great respect for the police, prison officers and others who have been concerned with this disastrous emergency in Manchester? Does he also agree that there is admiration for the tactful way in which the authorities have sought to bring the matter to a peaceful conclusion with the minimum of violence? Does he accept that it is welcome news that there is to be a thorough inquiry by a respected judge into the circumstances and that it is important to await the conclusion of that inquiry before determining the cause of this terrible tragedy? Will he separately bring forward his review of the management structure of the prison service in England and Wales and give further consideration to the plight of overcrowding in the old, inner-city Victorian prisons?

Mr. Waddington: As my hon. Friend knows, we have made considerable inroads into the overcrowding problem, but that problem is undoubtedly concentrated on the old local prisons. That is the trouble. However, one of the tragedies with Manchester is that it is a setback to all the plans that have been put in train and the progress that has already been made to get rid of overcrowding in our prisons.

I heard what my hon. Friend said about the efforts that have been made to bring this terrible event to a peaceful conclusion. Again, all those matters are for Lord Justice Woolf, but many might take the view that, in this kind of incident, one should bend one's efforts towards bringing the matter to an end peacefully, because any other course, when other lives are not imminently in danger, could result in more injuries, if not deaths.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): My right hon. and hon. Friends and I would like to join in with the sympathy that has been expressed for the families of the prison officer and the prisoner who have died.

Can the Home Secretary tell us how many prisoners from Strangeways are unaccounted for following the dispersal to other prisons?

I welcome very much the appointment of a very distinguished lord justice of appeal to undertake the inquiry, but will the Home Secretary confirm that Lord Justice Woolf will, as part of his terms of reference, be able to review how rule 43 is operated, because it appears that one of the problems that has arisen is the juxtaposition of rule 43 restricted prisoners—protected prisoners—with other prisoners who have sought to commit violence against them?

Mr. Waddington: Of course we do not know at this juncture whether we have seen all those inside the prison. The figure that I gave earlier relates to the 12 people who have been identified and seen by prison staff. My latest information is that all the rule 43 prisoners have been accounted for.

Lord Justice Woolf will interpret the terms of reference as he thinks right. Obviously, he is likely to consider where the rule 43 prisoners were. The difficulty in a local prison such as Strangeways is that the young offenders must be separated from the old offenders and those on remand have to be separated from those who have been sentenced. Carrying out that exercise is quite a problem while at the same time separating all rule 43 prisoners not only from their colleagues, but from everyone else.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend ask the inquiry to consider whether it was more than just coincidence that this ghastly riot broke out on the same weekend as the serious riots in London? May we use this incident as a turning point to consider a new gaol with a new name, thus putting ghastly Victorian conditions behind us?

Mr. Waddington: It is too early to decide what we should do now after the terrible damage to Strangeways. Clearly I cannot say whether there was any element of copying what might have been seen on the television screens. I do not think that it is helpful to speculate about that.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the Home Secretary agree that if Lord Justice Woolf is to carry out a full and detailed inquiry, it might be wise, bearing in mind the fact that evidence already exists of criminality within the prison, that the inquiry should stretch beyond any prosecutions in respect of the criminality, because those who were there at the time could be granted immunity from subsequent prosecution and perhaps their evidence to the inquiry might be more detailed and valuable?

Mr. Waddington: Any question of immunity is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions. However, there is no reason why the inquiry should touch on the criminal investigation.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I want to express my admiration for those involved in dealing with the riot including the police, the fire brigade, the ambulance men and the prison officers, many of whom are my constituents.

Can my right hon. and learned Friend say how wide the inquiry is likely to be? My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) referred to overcrowding in prisons. Many practising lawyers and I are concerned that so many prisoners are inactive in prison. I believe in the old saying, "The devil finds work for idle hands to do." Many prisoners enter gaol without ever having done an honest day's work, and they come out in the same state.

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend may recall that I quoted some figures the other day. One of the sadnesses of this affair is that great improvements had taken place in the regimes at Manchester during the year or so before the disturbance. The House will forgive me if I repeat the figures that I gave the other day. The hours of activity for convicted adults were 12·79 hours a week last year, but 22·73 hours this year.

There is no doubt that the governor deserves our congratulations on the progress that has been made in Manchester. The other day I referred to the report of the chief inspector of prisons, who had a great deal to say about the progress that has been made in Manchester. He said:

"'life at Manchester is a great deal nearer what it should be, both for staff and inmates, than it was some two years ago . . . There was much more to praise than to decry in an establishment clearly going in the right direction and with an optimistic momentum.'"—[Official Report, 2 April 1990; Vol. 170, c. 904.]

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): How many prisoners have been transferred to Armley prison, in my constituency, which is already recognised as the most overcrowded prison in Britain? Problems of understaffing have been rumbling on in that prison for some months now. Can the Home Secretary give us positive assurance that additional overcrowding pressure will not simply be transferred from Strangeways to Armley prison in Leeds?

Mr. Waddington: Obviously prisoners had to be transferred, because it was an emergency. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman realises that that had to happen and that there are unfortunate consequences as a result. However, we will do our best to keep the hon. Gentleman informed. If he will get in touch with my office, I will give him what information I can about the transfer of prisoners to Armley.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): My right hon. and learned Friend has said that there have been no fatalities beyond the two that he mentioned. Will he comment on an extremely disturbing report on the "Today" programme this morning, in which a solicitor acting for one of the prisoners reported that the prisoner had said that he had seen two men who had been hanged and men who had been thrown over balconies? I understand that some of those issues are matters for the inquiry, but it is important to establish the extent of the brutality because the public should be aware of it. Will my right hon. and learned Friend comment on that?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend will recall that a very short time ago I said that all the rule 43 prisoners had been accounted for. So far, no bodies have been found. Obviously one does not want to say categorically that we will not come across a tragedy, but that is the position at present.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Does the Home Secretary accept that prison officers in various prisons that have accepted people from Strangeways should also be praised because of the difficulties that they face? In Liverpool, they accepted the situation with proper discussion and so on.

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman satisfied that people are getting information as quickly as they should when they find that relatives in prison are perhaps missing and they do not know what has happened to them? They are anxious, particularly when they read in the gutter press horrific stories of 20 bodies being seen and so on. Such reports may or may not be right, but they worry people.

The telephone number that the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave is all right, but the authorities cannot always give the answers. When prisoners are identified and their whereabouts and what has happened to them are known, I should have thought that it was the responsibility of the Home Office to let their relatives know as soon as possible so that worry is lifted from the people concerned.

Mr. Waddington: I appreciate the importance of what the hon. Gentleman has said. I certainly echo his thanks to the staff of other prisons who have had to bear a considerable burden in the past few days, and have borne it extremely well. The telephone number I mentioned has been available since Sunday. Obviously, we shall do our best to inform people , but people in prison now have the facility to ring their relatives, and people with members of their families in prison are invited to ring that number.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Will my right hon. and learned Friend pass on my congratulations to the governor and prison officers? Having an aging prison in my constituency, I know just how difficult conditions can be for them. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that his twin-track approach to sentencing is the long-term answer to overcrowding? It combines the need to protect the public from more violent criminals with much longer sentences and the need to reduce the prison population by getting as many people as possible back into the community.

Mr Waddington: My hon. Friend is entirely right. I make it plain that our White Paper was not the beginnings of a policy; it was the culmination of it. In recent years, more and more people have been dealt with by punishment in the community, and that has helped greatly towards the reduction in the prison population over the past two years.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Will the Home Secretary assure the House that the inquiry will examine the efficacy of keeping remand prisoners in establishments such as Strangeways? Does not the effectiveness of the emergency services and the prison staff signal the end of discussions on the privatisation of prisons?

Mr. Waddington: There never has been any question of the privatisation of prisons. On remand prisoners, there is a difficulty and a balance is to be struck. We want remand prisoners to be near their legal advisers and their families, and not too far from the courts before which they must appear. We shall never see the day when all remand prisoners are in establishments miles from city centres where the courts sit.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that many hon. Members think that some irresponsible comments have already been made in this matter, which also affects other prisons? Is it not a fact that warnings are nearly always given when violent men are mewed up in prison? It is nonsense to continue to say that the governor was especially warned—he must always be warned. Is it not also a fact that there are 2,700 fewer prisoners now and that there are 3,000 more prison officers than there were three years ago? It is entirely unhelpful to give the impression that prisons are overcrowded and understaffed, because that affects the morale of prison officers and people outside, and that irresponsibility should stop.

Mr. Waddington: Over the past 10 years there has been a 50 per cent. increase in the number of prison officers and only an 11 per cent. increase in the number of prisoners. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to make the point that, sometimes in the past few days, people have overlooked the very big increase in the staffing of prisons that has taken place in recent years. My hon. Friend is absolutely right about warnings, but, now that the inquiry has been set up, the best thing is for people who have any information that they think is relevant to give that information to the inquiry.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private Members' day. I shall allow questions to continue for another five minutes, and then we must make progress.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): Bearing in mind the difficulties of this sad incident, the fact that many prisoners have been transferred to other gaols where subsequent incidents have occurred and that other incidents have been happening at other gaols anyway, will the Home Secretary comment, albeit briefly, on the practice of containment? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman say whether, bearing in mind the violence and everything else that has occurred, containment is in the best interests of people who may be left in prison for a considerable time?

Mr. Waddington: That is a matter for decision by governors. It would be rash for politicians to tell governors how best to make such difficult decisions.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Will my right hon. and learned Friend ask Lord Justice Woolf to look not only at the problem of rule 43 prisoners but at the problem of HIV-positive prisoners and prisoners with AIDS who have their own problems in prison and are not at all the same as those who are under rule 43 conditions, even though they are often segregated?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Clearly it is not for me to tell Lord Justice Woolf what to look into. No doubt he will consider all those matters and will look at his terms of reference and then decide how he should approach the task that he has been set.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Are not the public entitled to know why only five prison officers accompanied 300 prisoners to the chapel last Sunday, a matter of 12 hours after a prison officer at Strangeways logged the fact that he believed that there would be violence the following day? Does that not show that inadequate manning inevitably leads to trouble?

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman's figures are wrong. I stated the other day that there were 10 prison officers inside the chapel, and there were also more prison officers outside. In any event, those matters are for Lord Justice Woolf's inquiry. I do not think that it helps when hon. Members propagate various rumours. All those matters can be established in due course by the inquiry.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): Although I enormously admire the way in which my right hon. and learned Friend has handled this extremely difficult tragedy, I was slightly disappointed with his reply to the hon. Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) about remand prisoners and privatisation. It is essential that remand prisoners, many of whom may be guilty of no crime whatever, are segregated from those who have been convicted. One way forward may be to have privatised prisons in which remand prisoners can be held separately.

Mr. Waddington: There never has been any question of the privatisation of prisons. The matter that was raised by my right hon. Friend the present Foreign Secretary was whether the private sector could play any part in remand centres. That matter is under consideration.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Home Secretary assure the House that the proposed Home Office reorganisation, which was deprecated by a number of prison governors, including the one at Strangeways, and its effect will be taken into account by the inquiry? Will he assure hon. Members that that reorganisation was not a prelude to privatisation of sections of the prison service, as many people thought? Will he, as a matter of urgency, review the proposed reorganisation to make sure that it is halted before any further adverse effects occur?

Mr. Waddington: It is not for me to express a view on that matter now because it goes wide of the statement, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is up to Lord Justice Woolf to look at his terms of reference and decide what matters are relevant and what matters are not relevant.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): I join hon. Members on both sides of the House in paying tribute to the courage of all those who have worked so hard to bring the matter to a conclusion. It should not be forgotten that they did not allow one prisoner to escape into the general public. Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the Home Office has plans to redevelop Manchester prison? Is it not important that any decision in the area should take account of the lessons to be learned from the distressing events of the past week?

Mr. Waddington: I said in my statement on Tuesday that, only days before the incident broke out, arrangements had been made for the purchase by the prison service of land adjoining the prison. My hon. Friend is right to congratulate all those involved. He has drawn attention to something that I should perhaps have mentioned earlier: not one prisoner escaped.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Whatever repugnance we may rightly feel for those convicted and gaoled for crimes involving sexual violence and abuse, they nevertheless deserve to be placed in circumstances governed by the highest degree of segregation. In the understandable haste surrounding the transfer of prisoners from Strangeways, was the need for protection of rule 43 prisoners maintained?

Mr. Waddington: Rule 43 prisoners were segregated. The trouble was that access was obtained to the part of the prison in which they were held. How any rule 43 prisoner is dealt with at the receiving establishment is a matter for the governor.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I too thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his wise handling of this tragic matter and for the Government's largest building programme this century for prisons which may bring an end to the disgusting circumstances in which prisoners have often been held hitherto. Does he agree that too many prisons are potential tinder boxes, because they are repositories of violent men, which are contained and made secure only through the bravery of prison officers? Will he make sure that not only the governors and the prison service but prison officers always have easy access to the constant support of his Department, and that their views are listened to?

Mr. Waddington: I would be the first to pay tribute to the bravery of prison officers, as many hon. Members from both sides of the House have done, for the way in which they responded to the emergency. I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his remarks about the prison building programme. It is a great tragedy that this incident will set it back.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry that it was not possible to call every hon. Member who wished to speak. I sought to call those who have a direct interest in the matter and those who were not called when the previous statement was made.

Iraq

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) must divide their time between them—they have 29 minutes each.

11.32 am

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I accept that Britain has diplomatic relations with several dictatorships with deplorable human rights records. I am aware of the criteria by which recognition is given and which successive Governments have followed. There are instances, however, when outrages against British interests or nationals lead to the conclusion that we should break off diplomatic relations in peace time. Hence, at present, Britain does not have relations with the authorities in power in Libya, Iran and Syria. I think that I am right in saying that that has the approval of the whole House.

The Government have told us that, despite recent events in Iraq affecting Britain, they intend to continue diplomatic relations with that country. No doubt the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who will reply to the debate, will reaffirm that position today. Leaving aside the matter of diplomatic relations, the House should take an interest in events in Iraq. That country was the subject of statements and private notice questions recently over the long detention and then execution of Farzad Bazoft. The case turned the spotlight on the nature of the dictatorship in Iraq. Mr. Bazoft was there by invitation of the authorities and was with a group of other journalists. We should remind ourselves that he had previously visited that country, again by invitation, on five occasions. Mr. Bazoft was stateless, but he travelled on British travel documents.

The regime seemed to take a sheer delight in Mr. Bazoft's execution. In Britain, the reaction was one of widespread dismay and anger. As the Minister will probably remind us, two other British citizens—Daphne Parish and Ian Richter—are still being held in Iraq. We all want to see their return to Britain as quickly as possible. No doubt those two cases will be the subject of continuing questions to Foreign Office Ministers.

What about the dictatorship itself? What sort of a country is Iraq? How has it been led in the past 10 or 15 years? Such questions are important and relevant to the United Kingdom and should be taken into account by the Government in their relations with the regime. Many British people believe that the Government's mild reaction to the execution of Mr. Bazoft was not appropriate. The contempt that the regime showed for British protests and representations demonstrated again that when one is dealing with totalitarian regimes, mild protests or appeasement of any kind simply do not work.

As I said yesterday during Foreign Office questions, terrorist dictatorships work on the basis that democracies are unlikely to act tough and will find all kinds of excuses for not doing so. The reaction of totalitarian regimes is simply to show contempt for what they see as weakness. That was the lesson of the 1930s and the continued criticism of the Opposition towards the dealings of the British regime with Nazi Germany and Mussolini's Italy.

[Mr. David Winnick]

I have referred to Iraq as a terrorist regime. I certainly believe that that is an accurate description. It is one of the most notorious and bloodstained dictatorships in existence. That is saying a great deal when one thinks of the other dictatorships in various parts of the globe. In Iraq there is constant spying on and intimidation of its citizens, mass arrests, prolonged and savage tortures, show trials and large-scale executions, including public hangings. Those are all part of the way in which Saddam Hussein has ruled Iraq in recent years.

One of the worst crimes of the regime, and there have been many, was the use of chemical weapons in March 1987 against Kurds in a town in northern Iraq. Thousands died from the effects of the poison gas used. The regime denied that chemical weapons were used, but does anyone in the House or outside believe a word of what it says? The recent comments of the regime about a possible attack using chemical weapons against Israel give us even more reason to disbelieve it. By any standards, the attack using chemical weapons was a crime against humanity.

All the abuses in Iraq have been well documented in reports by Amnesty International. In 1989 that organisation referred to other crimes carried out by the terrorist regime. It dealt with the hundreds of executions of those considered to be opponents of the Government and army deserters. It said that routine torture and ill-treatment of prisoners continues to occur and that many are tortured to force them to sign confessions or to renounce their political affiliations. It said that political prisoners are reported to have been beaten, whipped, sexually abused, subjected to electric shocks and deprived of food. It also mentioned the cruel and sadistic tortures that have been inflicted on women prisoners. That is all part of the regime ruled over by Saddam Hussein in that unhappy country, as it has been for so many years.

Another report from Amnesty International devoted entirely to the detention of children documents the brutal treatment of young people, many of them very young, held in Iraqi prisons. Some of those children are executed once they have reached 16 or 17. Children in Iraq are frequently arrested and held as hostages in lieu of their parents or other relatives.

Some hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members—I emphasise that they are not present now—may say that what goes on in other countries is not our concern, that we should not worry unduly about that and that we should mind our own business. Twenty-two years ago, I had an Easter Adjournment debate on the military regime in Greece. A year had passed since the colonels had taken over and I protested strongly about the dictatorship and the brutalities occurring there. I quoted then from Amnesty International reports. On that occasion I was sitting on the Government Benches and I did not receive much support, if any, from Conservative Members.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I place on record my concern, and that of many Conservative Members, that Iraq may, in the near future, have nuclear weapons which could have a destabilising effect on the middle east.

Mr. Winnick: I shall come to that point in a moment. The House of Commons should always be concerned with brutality and torture in other countries. If we as a House refuse to show such interest, we shall lose one of our important roles and one of our most honourable traditions. That is my view and I am not likely to change my mind.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the possible manufacture of nuclear weapons by Iraq, and the events of last week at Heathrow airport were a timely reminder of the determination of Iraq's criminal regime to manufacture nuclear weapons. I know that the argument of British domestic policy is that we should have nuclear weapons because other countries have them. I shall not go into that controversy today. No doubt Saddam Hussein would use the same type of argument. But that undoubtedly shows the immense dangers to humanity of nuclear weapons of any sort being in the hands of a criminal regime with a bloodstained record such as I have been describing. I hope that the possible manufacture of nuclear weapons by Iraq will be the subject of much interest not only in Britain and the western world, but among Arab countries, too.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Would not that also be relevant to our attitude towards the protection of the state of Israel, because what happens in Iraq must be of direct concern to the democratically elected members of a state which is at risk?

Mr. Winnick: Yes. I am critical of the policies pursued by Israel, certainly in the occupied territories—the Minister knows my view—but I agree with my hon. Friend.

I strongly urge that the banning of all export high-level technology to Iraq should be given the highest priority and that every effort should be made urgently to seek co-operation on that, certainly from the countries of western Europe, but also, as I pointed out yesterday, from the Soviet Union and other countries of eastern Europe. One of the most significant things about the renewal or the beginning of the democratic process in eastern Europe and, I hope, in the Soviet Union, is that those countries will no longer wish in any way, directly or indirectly, to support terrorists or criminal regimes.

The sanctions that I have just been urging should be applied against Iraq as soon as possible. Trade credits to the regime should also be ended. I know all the arguments about the benefits to Britain of such trade, but the more that we can isolate such a regime the better it will be, not only for our well-being in Britain, but for humanity as a whole.

We also need the support of Arab states in spotlighting the dangers to their countries. That is not directly a matter for the British Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) mentioned Israel, and that is clearly a matter which will deeply concern the Israeli Government. But Arab countries in the region—Muslim countries—will recognise the dangers of Iraq acquiring nuclear weapons and, in particular, the territorial ambitions of Saddam Hussein. I hope that such dangers will be recognised by countries such as Egypt.

When we raise such matters, it is sometimes argued that we are being critical of Muslim countries. It should not be forgotten that the large majority of victims of the regime that I have been describing have been Muslims. In the main, the Kurds are Muslim. One should also remember that Iraq started the Gulf war. Perhaps at that time it was in western interests to see Iran defeated, but it should not be forgotten who started the war. The millions of casualties which resulted from those two ruthless dictatorships fighting for years were all Muslims. That was a needless and senseless war and I am only too pleased that it has finally come to an end. The leaders of Iraq may welcome a new war to divert attention from domestic problems. I have already referred to the territorial ambitions of Saddam Hussein.

I have chosen this subject because, following recent events, including what happened at Heathrow, it is necessary to spotlight what has been happening. I hope that this subject will continue to interest the House when we return after the recess. I hope that every opportunity will be taken by the Government to pursue the line that I have urged—not appeasement and not a show of weakness, but a recognition of all the dangers involved in the criminal regime in Iraq, to try to isolate it in every way possible and to seek the utmost international co-operation in pursuing that course.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. William Waldegrave): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) for giving the House another opportunity to express, as I am sure it will wish to, its horror at the execution of Farzad Bazoft, and I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has said about that case. I shall make one or two comments on the wider issues of our relations with countries whose regime we abhor and whose human rights records we know to be dreadful. Both those things, I am sad to say, are true of Iraq at the present time. We have made that clear in recent years.

I am responsible, under my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, for relations with the middle east, Africa, eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. With the wonderful exception of events in eastern Europe, there are —with one or two honourable exceptions—few countries among those for which I am responsible whose human rights record or commitment to democracy would meet the approval of this House. If this country's diplomatic relations, let alone trading relations, were to be dictated as our hearts would like to dictate them, and if we were to maintain relations only with countries of which we approved, our relationships around the world would be few.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North is justified in saying that Iraq is among the nations having the worst record of human rights—although I could put others in that dismal competition.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the Minister accept that few other countries have taken action against someone travelling on a British passport, or at least with British travel documents, in the way that Iraq did recently?

Mr. Waldegrave: Mr. Bazoft was not travelling on a British passport, but, like many displaced people, used travel documents issued by the country in which he was staying.

The list of executions that have taken place in the countries for which I am responsible is very long, and there are many competitors—alongside the catalogue of those who have been tortured and wrongly imprisoned.

It is the duty of all countries which are signatories to the United Nations convention, and certainly the duty of this House, to protest whenever possible. When a case comes close to us, such as that of Farzad Bazoft, who was working for a British employer at the time of his arrest and travelling on British travel documents, it is right that the House should do what it can. My Government made major efforts to save Mr. Bazoft, aligning a huge international protest. Tragically, that effort failed, but I am sure that the hon. Member for Walsall, North acknowledges that Britain did all that it could to save Mr. Bazoft. Those of us working in the Foreign Office were as distressed as anyone by the terrible outcome of that affair.

Farzad Bazoft's confession, which was about the only document put before the court, is a pathetic document, because it clearly tells the truth about a number of rather low-level contacts that Mr. Bazoft had with special branch officers in this country when he was trying—as journalists do—to swap information with the police about Iranian dissidents and about demonstrations in London some years ago. Whether deliberately or in ignorance, that admission was taken by the Iraqis as evidence that Mr. Bazoft was in touch with the British secret services, and so on. The horror is complete because, from what I have read of his confession, Mr. Bazoft told the truth. By telling that truth, which was entirely innocent, he was taken as condemning himself.

As to the remarks of the hon. Member for Walsall, North concerning chemical weapons, at the chemical weaponry conference in Paris last year, Britain was the only country, not only in Europe but the world, to name Iraq as having breached its 1925 obligation. We were in the forefront of protests about that breach and welcomed the commitment given by Iraq at the conference that it would not recur—a commitment that we hope will be honoured.

As the hon. Member for Walsall, North rightly said, we were deeply involved in the desperate attempt to stop the export of nuclear weaponry technology not only to Iraq but to other countries, as was our duty under the non-proliferation treaty and the missile technology control regime. I join the hon. Gentleman in emphasising that one of the most hopeful developments is the new, genuine adherence to those measures by the Soviet Union, which is making it known that, although it is not willing at present to join the missile technology control regime, it will act as though it has done so and in parallel with its requirements. That is a most helpful and hopeful development.

Another hopeful development in the whole area of terrorism is that a number of former safe havens in eastern Europe have gone for ever. The countries that formerly served as safe havens are now taking steps to join those of us who act against terrorists, which is most beneficial.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it true, as reported in The Independent on Sunday, that the same capacitors as were allegedly brought into the United Kingdom are available in university laboratories in London? Are efforts being made in the United States to monitor the production of the capacitors to ensure that they do not enter the export chain?

Mr. Waldegrave: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question is no. The success of our extremely succesful joint investigation with the Americans over several months answers the hon. Gentleman's second question.

I have little argument with the hon. Member for Walsall, North about our horror at many practices of the Iraqi regime and of many others. He asked us to consider taking further steps against them. However, I genuinely believe that it would be wrong for us to break diplomatic relations with all those countries whose human rights records fall short of what we desire.

Mr. Winnick: I agree.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman concurs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has pointed out that we broke off relations with a number of countries that took steps against our citizens either from their diplomatic premises in Britain—as in the Libyan or Syrian cases—or in their own country, as in Iran. We maintain diplomatic relations with a range of other countries whose practices, I am sorry to say, we deplore.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has pointed out that if we were to withdraw from Iraq, where there are 2,000 British business men and British prisoners—the hon. Gentleman was right to refer to the cases of Mrs. Parish and Mr. Richter, on whose behalf we continue to work hard—we would leave British citizens without such help as our diplomats can provide. We would be left with a swathe of countries, from the Khyber pass in Afghanistan, across to the Mediterranean and Syria, without any British diplomatic representation. We must avoid that if we can.

The trade argument is one point on which I disagree with the hon. Member for Walsall, North. It suggests that we are granting the countries concerned a privilege by allowing them to buy things from us. However, it is worth remembering when horrible cases arise that we ask our business men to earn this country's living by going to some of the most unappealing places in the world, and by living often in constrained and unpleasant circumstances, to help keep people employed in our country. A Conservative Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, once remarked, "Exporting is fun." I am not sure to what extent that sentiment would be echoed by business men who have to operate in some of the countries that I have mentioned, to win orders to keep their factories running at home.

It is argued that Britain should cut off trade credits. Nothing would please Treasury Ministers more, for they are always against lending money to anyone. However, if British business men are to be sent in to bat against the Germans, Japanese and Italians without even the minimal support of trade credits, one might as well not send them at all. We are not granting Iraq a privilege but are competing against all the industrial countries in earning our living as a trading nation.

There is no question of isolating Iraq. The Arab League unanimously supports Iraq on the Bazoft case. A number of our friends in the Arab world asked for clemency beforehand, but the Arab League afterwards passed a motion supporting Iraq, and a further motion supporting Iraq against the media campaign on nuclear matters which it alleges has subsequently taken place.

Therefore, I fear that it is being hopeful to have the idea that cutting off British trade credits and trying to prevent British business men from going to that market—not that we could legally do it—would isolate Iraq. That could create satisfaction among our industrial competitors and it would lose us jobs and orders in Britain. It would have no other effect.

Like the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), I would have much preferred to stand at the Dispatch Box in the times of Lord Palmerston or perhaps even of Mr. Anthony Eden—although I doubt whether the hon. Lady would have supported his exercise of power in the middle east. However, those days are not with us now and it is no good pretending that they are.

Mr. Winnick: Although I was around at the time, but not in this place, no one could have been more opposed to that criminal Suez adventure than I was.

As I tried to emphasise in my remarks, is there not a need for co-ordinated action, or is the Minister of State telling us that other democracies are so short-sighted that they do not recognise that to take advantage of any actions we take would not be in their interests?

Mr. Waldegrave: I pay tribute to the European Community, which protested strongly, and to those countries in the Arab world which asked for clemency on our behalf—as a good many did, including King Hussein.

If the hon. Member for Walsall, North thinks that it is possible to arrange a trade boycott of Iraq because of these events, he is whistling in the wind. It is completely impossible. I fear that those are the facts. We have to live with them and to recognise the limits of our power.

However, that does not mean that we should not protest—we should. It does not mean that we should not conduct relations with a country that behaves in such a way, although it will obviously be in a different style than with those countries with which we are friendly.

Mrs. Dunwoody rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I have only one more minute.

It is not sensible to pretend to our people that we have powers that we do not have. Nor is it sensible to pretend that we have the luxury of living as a self-contained island that does not have to trade with, potentially, hundreds of regimes round the world which do not meet the human rights standards that we seek to defend in the House. That is the truth of the matter.

The tensions and dangers in the middle east ultimately derive from the unsolved problems of the region. If the Iran-Iraq war was not still suspended, those countries would not be seeking to arm themselves with terrible weapons. If the Arab-Israel dispute was following the course of a peace process—which the hon. Member for Walsall, North and I would both like—tensions would diminish.

As diplomats, that is where we should put our primary effort—to trying to remove the underlying conditions that give comfort to and produce those dreadful regimes, because it is the tensions within that region that help the maintenance and growth of the dictatorial regimes about which the hon. Gentleman so rightly protests. That is where our principal effort should be directed and that is where the Government's diplomatic efforts are still directed in the Iran-Iraq and Arab-Israel conflicts. If we can help to get those on their way to a solution, we shall have done something, in the longer term, to dissolve the conditions that produce the regimes against which we have to protest all too often.

Baltic States

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss the current situation in the Baltic states at such a timely moment.

I am sure that the House, if not the entire free world, including or course central and most of eastern Europe, have been watching developments from Lithuania with bated breath; with sympathy for the demands that its Parliament has made for independence, so recently and so clearly endorsed by the elections in February; with understanding for its declaration of independence and President Landsbergis's appeal for western recognition and support; with admiration at the cool and courageous way in which he and his colleagues are responding to the psychological pressure that is increasingly being applied by Moscow; with alarm at the intervention of the Red Army and its occupation of public buildings and of the free press, the expulsion of foreign correspondents and the closure of the border with Poland; with fear that the situation will lead to a classic confrontation in the tradition of the Breznev doctrine, which the world had understood had been abandoned; and with distress at the consequences of such an intervention for the remarkable progress that has been made to end the cold war and to improve east-west relations, and in arms control, and for President Gorbachev himself and his progress towards political and economic reform, which we fully support—provided, of course, that he means what he says.

That is where the matter rests at the moment, perhaps awaiting a further turn of the screw to encourage negotiations on the Kremlin's terms.

I have no doubt that all that was discussed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister with President Gorbachev during their telephone conversation last week and is being discussed by Mr. Baker and Mr. Shevardnadze in Washington and that the limits beyond which it is unacceptable for both sides to go are being clearly spelled out.

To date, the line that western Governments have taken in public, including Her Majesty's Government, has been that the future of the Baltic states is an internal matter for the Soviet Union and the republics concerned. That is a lie which I cannot accept any more, and I do not believe that the House will accept it either.

As I said to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on Tuesday, the secret protocol of 1939 makes the Baltic states a special case. Their problem is not just a Soviet problem; it is a European one. Like German unification, it is the legacy of the last war, which can and should be resolved only by the four powers in a European context within the forums that already exist for the resolution of such matters, peacefully, securely and in a spirit of co-operation. That is what the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe—the Helsinki process—is all about. That is the principal argument of my debate today, and I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, will respond to it.

Perhaps at this point it would be helpful for us to recall the events that led to the occupation and annexation of the Baltic states into the Soviet Union in 1939 and 1940. In 1918, the Baltic states gained independence of the Russian empire amid that turbulent period which saw the German advance, following the withdrawal of the Bolshevik forces, turn into a retreat in November.

The Russian civil war that followed became a war of independence for the Baltic peoples. Eventually, in 1920, peace treaties were signed with the Soviet Union which unreservedly recognised the independence of the new republics from Russia, which renounced all former rights of sovereignty "voluntarily and forever".

In 1921, the League of Nations recognised all three states to which de jure recognition had been extended by most countries and they became member states of the league. Further independently negotiated treaties with the Soviet Union confirmed the legitimacy of the new states.

Liberal democratic constitutions were adopted. Minority rights were guaranteed by law, and no one group exercised significant political influence. Tragically, proportional representation led to a plethora of small parties, which in turn led to cabinet instability, parliamentary paralysis and a series of largely pre-emptive coups d'etat and the setting-up of largely authoritarian regimes.

With the resurgence of Germany, the Soviet Union became concerned about its security in the event of German aggression against the Baltic states, and saw an opportunity for territorial expansion. On 23 August 1939, Ribbentrop and Molotov agreed a treaty of non-aggression. That was the public document published at the time. On the same day, however, a secret additional protocol concerning their respective spheres of influence in Poland and the Baltic area was signed. That was amended by a further secret protocol on 28 September transferring Lithuania to the Soviet sphere.

Following the German invasion of Poland, all three states were forced to conclude military alliances with the Soviet Union. All three treaties assured the Baltic Governments that their sovereignty would be fully respected, but it was not long before Soviet troops entered the Baltic states. They were incorporated into the Soviet Union behind a facade of ligitimacy.

When the Soviets returned in 1944, following the German occupation, there was a large-scale flight to the west which was not surprising. They knew what to expect: enforced collectivisation, industrialisation and integration into the Soviet economy, and persecution of the church and of all nationalist consciousness. Six hundred thousand people were deported to Siberia; hundreds of thousands of people were killed in Soviet prison camps. The process of Russification, through the immigration of Russian peoples, was designed to swamp the Baltic majority.

During the 40 years of apparent acquiescence to the Soviet occupation that followed, it is clear that Baltic nationalism was barely affected. At every level of society, people used their official positions to preserve national identity and integrity. However, it is only during the past two years that there have been more changes in the Baltic states than at any time since Stalin—in response to unprecedented popular demands, themselves in response to glasnost and perestroika, that have led so dramatically to today's circumstances. The establishment of the popular fronts in Latvia and Estonia and Sajudis in Lithuania provided the impetus and the channel for national self-assertion, the adoption of national flags and symbols and the more recent demands for independence and a democratic parliamentary system.

Not far behind have been the Communist parties of all three states which, either through conviction or for survival, declared their own independence from the Communist party of the Soviet Union in support of national self-determination. Perhaps one of the most impressive and moving peaceful demonstrations in history of solidarity between peoples against an occupying power took place on 23 August 1989 to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, when more than 1 million people linked hands in a human chain across all three republics.

In its initial response to such clear demonstrations of nationalism, Moscow postponed environmentally sensitive projects, restored Vilnius cathedral to the Roman Catholic Church, granted economic sovereignty and decentralisation and proposed the prospect of limited sovereignty. In addition, the Yakovlev commission was established to inquire into the status of the secret protocol. Throughout last year, and into this, the Parliaments of all three states seemed to outdo each other in declaring ever-more daring acts of defiance in pursuit of independence, with Lithuania making the running in declaring Soviet annexation invalid and adopting laws to pave the way for a referendum on independence and ending the party's leading role.

Given the fact that such unprecedented demands for nationalism were being emulated elsewhere in the Soviet Union, it became clear that it could not be allowed to continue unchecked without undermining President Gorbachev's position and authority. In December, he appealed to Lithuania to reject the idea of an independent state outside the Soviet Union, although in January, during his visit to Lithuania, he promised legislation to permit an orderly secession. The Yakovlev commission declared the secret protocol to the contrary to international law but claimed that that did not invalidate the incorporation of the Baltic republics into the USSR in 1940.

In February this year, the terms of such secession became clearer, including the requirement that three quarters of the population must participate in a referendum, which would be followed by a transitional period of five years—endorsed this week by the Soviet Parliament. If that was designed to discourage demands for immediate independence, it has failed. In last month's elections to the Lithuanian supreme soviet, Sajudis obtained 97 seats out of 141 and Gallup reported 63 per cent. in favour of full independence. Its supreme council has adoped a declaration of sovereignty and a resolution reinstating the constitution of 1938.

More recent elections in Latvia and Estonia have also produced majorities for independence candidates, despite the influx of Russian troops to influence the results with their votes. In response, the USSR's Congress of People's Deputies, which I attended last month, appointed a commission to review the position, since when the Government have refused to accept the Lithuanian declaration of independence and have sent Soviet troops to occupy party buildings in Vilnius and to arrest deserters.

As the whole world knows, President Landsbergis has refused to withdraw the declaration and has appealed for international recognition and support. It is an appeal reminiscent of Dubcek's in 1968 and of Nagy's in 1956. We must all hope and work for a solution that does not end in similar tragedies. President Gorbachev, of course, is cleverer than that.

Surely the events of the past two years have proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the Baltic peoples have demonstrated, demanded and voted for nothing less than a return to independence. There is even evidence that their ethnic Russian populations would opt for the prospect of the greater prosperity that would result from being in control of their own destiny. Moreover, we know from their previous independence that they are capable of economic self-sufficiency and would—like Finland, whose economy was much weaker after the war—have become fully integrated into the western economy by now. Indeed, they argue that it is in the Soviet Union's interests for independent Baltic states to act, as Finland is now, as entrepots for trade and technology with the west.

It seems to me that the way is now open for Her Majesty's Government to take initiatives to resolve the future of the Baltic states in a way that should not threaten President Gorbachev's position. First, let us confirm that the secret protocol of 1939 and its implementation in 1940 was a clear breach of international law which determines the Baltic states as a special case. Secondly, it is no longer good enough to regard this matter as one for the Soviet Union as the de facto power and as one for negotiation between the parties concerned. The fact that we withhold de jure recognition of Soviet annexation implies that we will recognise, de facto, a return to independence. If Soviet occupation remains illegal, as it does, current events mean that we can no longer remain silent as to what we would regard as legal. To do so would encourage Moscow to intensify its intimidation.

Does not article 12 of the Soviet constitution as it stands allow for secession? Does not article 1 of both the international covenant on civil and political rights and the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights proclaim the right of peoples to self-determination? Does not principle 8 of the Helsinki Final Act guarantee the right of people to self-determination and also their wish, in full freedom, to determine when and as they wish their internal and external status, with the Act itself providing for change in frontiers by peaceful means and agreement?

As they do, do not these international obligations, entered into by the Soviet Union, by us and by all other members of our European community, now require us to seek a solution to the Baltic problem in the wider framework of east-west relations and within that common European home to which President Gorbachev gives credence, which is the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe process?

Let us now consult our council of Europe and CSCE colleagues to agree to raise the future of the Baltic states at the forthcoming summit under the Helsinki process, which is already planned to take account of the irreversible events in central and eastern Europe, including, in particular, the forthcoming unification of Germany and the signing of a peace treaty? To ignore the consequences of the secret protocol in seeking to resolve, once and for all, the consequences of the last war, would be a lie.

I accept that these consequences go beyond the Baltic states. They apply to the western Ukraine and Moldavia too, but we should not be put off by that. Any solution must be a freely negotiated one, but it must be on Europe's terms, not those of the Soviet Union. Since no referendum was held in 1940 to determine the Baltic peoples' wish to nullify their independence, we certainly should not support any suggestion of a referendum to put right what international law has found to be illegal. The recent elections have confirmed the people's choice. As President Gorbachev said to the United Nations in December 1988:

"Freedom of choice is a universal principle which allows no exceptions."

The situation in the Baltic states today determines that these questions must be resolved, and resolved soon. The CSCE is the means. The forthcoming summit is the opportunity. Her Majesty's Government can be the initiator. I look forward to my right hon. Friend's response.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. William Waldegrave): It give me genuine pleasure to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), who has raised an extremely topical subject, and I congratulate him on his success in being able to introduce the debate. I shall comment on his extremely comprehensive and learned speech. My officials could find no fault with the history that he set out. I share with the House the fact that my hon. Friend did me the courtesy of showing me a copy of his speech in advance.

My principal points are in agreement with my hon. Friend. First, he is right to recognise that the progress that has already been made in the Baltic states must owe a great deal to perestroika and glasnost and to the much more liberal policy followed by Mr. Gorbachev and his colleagues in recent years. The response of previous Soviet regimes, let alone Stalin, was very different.

It is worth recognising that the fact that the Baltic people are now, we hope, on the way to recovering their legal rights of independence is another of the beneficial side effects of the general improvement and loosening up in the Soviet Union. That gives us and the Soviet Union the responsibility of doing nothing as any action would give such succour to the enemies of the process of liberalisation in the Soviet Union—and there are many of them—as to bring that process to an end. That is the tightrope which the Baltic peoples—with skill and restraint so far—are walking.

Secondly, I agree with my hon. Friend that the danger is extremely close to the surface. It is easy to imagine incidents as a result of provocation or accident which could lead to disaster. The mature behaviour of people in Lithuania—of whom we have seen most in our newspapers and electronic media—in Estonia and in Latvia deserves tribute.

My hon. Friend gave an interesting account of the passage of history, making passing reference to the usual disasters that follow from proportional representation. He made a rather pregnant remark when he reminded us of the disasters in Hungary and Czechoslovakia in 1956 and 1968. Everyone of our generation remembers the poignant way in which the radio stations said, "Remember us," when they were closed down. That also reminds us of our responsibility.

The history books now show that many young people in 1956 and 1968 believed that in some impossible way the west would physically come to their rescue. Right until the end they were asking where were the American marines, the British and the French.

We should do nothing in any physical sense—and I am sure that the passage of history has made the Baltic people much more aware of the truth—to raise any expectations that we cannot meet. I am not saying that we should not bring other pressures to bear and enter into the diplomatic process, but it is worth putting it clearly on record that the questions and propositions at the end of my hon. Friend's speech when he talked of the CSCE mechanisms and discussions and the process leading to independence. That is the path we must follow.

However, I must correct my hon. Friend on one point. Britain does not regard the matter as an internal one for the Soviet Union. Our position, like that of most of the principal western countries, is that the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact was illegal and that there has never been a legal incorporation of the Baltic states into the Soviet Union. Therefore, it is not pari passu with events in other parts of the Soviet Union; it is important to make that distinction. That is one of the elements that may lead to a solution. Clearly there must be many in the Soviet Union who fear any movement on the Baltic states as leading to a precedent that would make things extremely difficult for the Soviet Union.

We do not believe that that issue has to be addressed in relation to the Baltic states. They already have a ring around them, given the fact that we and the Soviet Union now believe that the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact was illegal. There is a ring of legality and separateness around the Baltic states, and it is worth drawing attention to that.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister put that clearly on record in the House on 27 March when she said:

"we have never recognised the annexation"

of the Baltic states

"to the Soviet Union as being legal."—[Official Report, 27 March 1990; Vol. 170, c. 205.]

I should like to raise a number of points about what will happen next and what we should be seeking to do, which was how my hon. Friend finished his excellent speech. We have taken a number of steps to make it clear that, although we have been urging restraint on the people of the Baltic states and congratulating them on their exercise of that restraint, we should be urging the same restraint on the Soviet Union. We made that clear at the Dispatch Box yesterday. The European Community has twice made it clear in authoritative statements that we do not approve of the threats that have been made. That is not the way to solve the problem.

There has been sabre rattling—with modern technological means rather than with sabres—and, in a repeated statement by the Twelve issued yesterday, we have all deplored that. The Twelve stated that the situation remains difficult and that we are concerned about the potentially serious consequences which an aggravation of the situation might have on the improved climate prevailing in Europe and that the Twelve expressed the hope that a purposeful dialogue between Vilnius and Moscow—they were talking about Lithuania—will commence in the very near future. They call for good will on both sides and the maximum restraint on all sides so as not to aggravate an already delicate situation. Therefore, the message goes very clearly to both sides.

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Does the Minister agree that it is important for the Twelve, as part of their common foreign policy process, to take that a little further and to take some firm initiatives directly with Moscow to facilitate those negotiations?

Mr. Waldegrave: That leads me to what steps Britain can take. There will be continuous discussions with our European partners and at the recent General Affairs Council meeting and other informal meetings it has been, and will continue to be, near the top of the agenda. We now have a series of high-level contacts starting with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary going to Moscow on Monday, followed not long after by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister talked to Mr. Gorbachev at length on the telephone in the spirit in which I am now addressing the House. The Secretary of State had a meeting with the Soviet ambassador in London on 28 March. We shall be pressing for dialogue and discussion, and a peaceful solution to the problem.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East rightly pointed out, everyone seems agreed about the long-term goal. Mr. Gorbachev has implied that he does not rule out independence; what concerns him is the legality of the process, and who are we to argue against legal processes? Nevertheless, we must be careful. I suspect that the Lithuanians would not fear any test of genuine opinion in their country. What worries us are the provisions in the new secession law agreed yesterday and published under article 72 of the Soviet constitution.

We can argue with some of the provisions concerning tests of opinion, but at least they are genuinely aimed at finding out what opinions are held in the Baltic states. The requirement for a two-thirds majority in the Congress of People's Deputies, however, is a different kind of hurdle, as it effectively gives two or three of the biggest republics a veto on secession, whatever the majority opinion in the Soviet Union—let alone that in the Baltic states, whose right to independence should be guaranteed by the legal background.

We shall discuss that problem with the Soviet leadership. Nothing could be worse than the development in the Baltic states of the idea that they will be tricked into a cul de sac; it would be difficult to control the resulting frustration, and that would lead to dangers.

We should not concern ourselves too much with tests of opinion, or with the length of the transitional period. I suspect that we know what the opinion is, and a transitional period of some years may be necessary in any event to disentangle the economy. We must, however, try to ensure that an impossible hurdle is not placed before the people of the Baltic states in the guise of legality, thus vitiating the welcome guarantee from Mr. Gorbachev and Mr. Gerasimov that independence—legally secured—is on the cards. That means concentrating on discussion and representation: we must not pre-empt the good will that can surely be engendered by the willingness to talk that the Soviets have expressed over the past few days.

A disaster is easily possible. The Government urge restraint on the Soviet Union, and also on the people of the Baltic states. What we want is a dialogue about how they are to achieve their legal right to independence.

Rail Services (North-West)

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I have already pursued all the points that I wish to make with the Minister and with British Rail. Let me make it clear at the outset that I am not criticising or attacking British Rail. I do, however, criticise some aspects of Government policy: in my view, the Government fail to recognise the importance of public investment in the railway system—and, indeed, in public transport generally. There is a much better case for subsidising rail and bus services than they believe.

What I have to say is relevant not only to transport but to energy. Investment in public transport should commend itself to a Government who claim to be interested in the environment, as it is one of the best ways of dealing with some of our environmental problems.

Let me deal first with rail connections with the Channel tunnel, and services to the north-west as a whole. The service on the west coast line, which was the first long-distance rail network in the country to be electrified, does not remotely match that on the east coast. Prior to electrification, the service from London to York took two hours, whereas the best service journey from London to Preston takes about two hours 40 minutes. I accept that that is partly because junctions and curves restrict speed, but investment is needed to achieve the standard of service that the north-west deserves.

The north-west deserves not second best but the best. It has a large population and is a major manufacturing region. The Minister should take account of the important fact that since 1979 jobs in manufacturing in the north-west have declined by 30 per cent. Investment and output are also down by more than 30 per cent. in real terms. One of the reasons for that is that the north-west does not have the road and rail communications necessary to encourage investment.

The Channel tunnel offers British Rail one of the best opportunities for investment and improvement in services that it has had this century. However, it is restrained by section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987, which restricts public investment in international services using the Channel tunnel. The Government should review that section.

There is a case for a link for passengers and freight that bypasses west London to the west coast main line and the Channel tunnel. The proposed links with Euston and King's Cross are second best and are not an acceptable solution.

Lancashire county council is concerned about those issues. In a letter dated 12 March, Brian Hill, its chief executive, said:

> "The passenger proposals underestimate the likely demand for Channel Tunnel services and, as a consequence, fail to provide the North West, and Lancashire in particular, with the level of service which is justified, and the freight proposals fail to acknowledge existing freight terminal facilities in the County and ignore the County Council's call for a freight depot in central Lancashire, and do not provide sufficient details about the services which will be provided when the Channel Tunnel opens."

That letter refers to British Rail's proposals under section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act, which it had to publish last year. The county council's views are right, and I hope that the Government will have second thoughts about those important proposals.

The Channel tunnel offers us an opportunity to get freight off the roads and on to the railways. Even if rail freight were to increase by 50 per cent., road freight would decrease by only 5 per cent. The current growth in road freight is 5 per cent., so it will be extremely difficult even to stand still.

All people who use roads know that, even if the Government meet the proposed investment in the roads programme, there will still be major traffic problems well into the next century unless we get some of the long-distance freight back on the railways. If the north-west is to have jobs and a future as a manufacturing region, which is so important to the future of this nation, we need rail investment to encourage people to use railways.

I and many colleagues have long campaigned for the link to Manchester airport. In a letter dated 17 August, Greater Manchester passenger transport authority confirms that the former Secretary of State indicated that it should be operational by 1993. I hope that that timetable is adhered to and that the rail link is operating by that date. I hope that the Minister will agree that, although the link improves the service from the north side of Manchester airport to the airport, we need to consider whether there should be rail access from the south side of Manchester airport for people who use that great international airport.

It would be wrong for me not to welcome some of the improvements made by British Rail to local services in the north-west in recent years. The improvements to some stations in Lancashire, in co-operation with Lancashire county council, are most welcome, although only last week, while travelling on the line, I saw that there had been damage to some of the new panels of the shelters. The shelters cost a considerable sum and it is a matter of great regret to me, to Lancashire county council, to British Rail and, I am sure, to the Minister that money has been wasted in that way.

Another example of a change for the better is the Windsor link, which has improved services between the north and south of Manchester. The Roses line, which runs from Preston, through Bradford and on to Leeds, was opened only about six years ago. Next month, it will provide an hourly service, which shows the potential for development of that line.

There is a case for electrification of some of the services within the region. It is ludicrous that Blackpool, one of the major tourist resorts of this country, does not have an electrified service. The line from Preston to Manchester should also be electrified, and there is a strong case for electrification of the Roses line. There is tremendous potential in linking east and west, and there could be an electrified service from Blackpool via Preston, Burnley and Bradford to Leeds. The Minister should consider that seriously, If that scheme were carried out, it would be stupid not to include the electrification of the east Lancashire line to Colne.

Another matter of concern to north-east Lancashire, part of which I represent, and especially to Burnley and Pendle, has been the service to Manchester. At present, one has to go to Blackburn and change for a train to Manchester, which takes a considerable time and is not a satisfactory solution. A link could be provided by going through Yorkshire, which would not involve great new investment in line, but only a small spur. That would give us a more direct and speedy service which would attract people. At present, few people from Burnley, Nelson or Colne use the rail service to Manchester because it is too slow and inefficient. Electrification of those services would bring about considerable improvement and benefits, and is worthy of consideration.

I know that the Minister will say that he and the Secretary of State are prepared to consider any case for electrification from British Rail if it can meet the Government's criteria and if it can justify it to the Government. The purpose of this debate is to say to the Minister that the Government's criteria are not satisfactory and that Government policy should change to enable British Rail to consider the electrification and development of services in a more positive light under new Government guidelines.

The removal of staff from stations is another important matter. I have here a letter from Sir Bob Reid, the chairman of British Rail, dated 26 February. He says that, at Burnley Central station,

> "a single member of staff can encompass ticket issuing as part of his duties and a permanent booking clerk's position will no longer be a feature of Burnley Central."

That is not acceptable to me, to Burnley borough council or to those who use the station. We want staffing levels not only to be maintained but to be improved. When we do away with staff, whether on buses or on railway stations, we discourage elderly people, women and those who fear vandalism and violence from using the services. We must recognise that it can be short-sighted to save on staff wages, because the cost of the increase in damage and vandalism that results from destaffing, and the fact that it discourages passengers, can lead to a net deficit.

Preston station is a major interCity station, and a number of local Lancashire services also run from it. Lancashire county council and British Rail have done much work to improve the station. Incidentally, they are also to improve some aspects of Burnley Central station, where the improved access on one level will be a welcome development for disabled people. At Preston station, however, there remains a great problem for disabled people who need to use platforms 1 and 2 because the only access is by means of very difficult stairs. In a letter dated 3 April, Brian Hill, of Lancashire county council, wrote:

> "I would, however, point out that, despite improvements to other parts of the Station, British Rail has failed to come up with a solution for improving access to platforms 1 and 2 for passengers with a mobility handicap. These are the main platforms for British Rail's provincial services at Preston."

We are seeing the end of an era during which the railways declined. In the past few years, there has been a move in a different direction. If the Government rethink their policy and accept that public investment in public transport—in particular, in the railway system, locally, nationally and internationally—they will improve transport and will bring environmental advantages that will certainly be welcome in the north-west.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Michael Portillo): I have great pleasure in responding to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and I congratulate him on having secured the opportunity to talk about rail services in the north-west, which is an important subject. I enjoyed his speech greatly. He took us rattling around the north-west and covered a lot of ground.

However, I found a number of contradictions in what the hon. Gentleman said. He began with an attack on the Government for their lack of investment and then, with a generosity that is typical of him, paid tribute to the improvements made to stations, services and rolling stock in the north-west. He is absolutely right about that: there have been many improvements and the Government's investment programme has been substantial. The hon. Gentleman and I are not as far apart as he may think. I certainly echo the sentiments with which he ended his speech. I, too, believe that there is considerable scope for the revival of the railways in Britain—not least in the north-west.

[Mr. Michael Portillo]

At one point, the hon. Gentleman set about predicting what I might say in my speech, and he was accurate in that, too. I shall indeed be talking about the investment that has taken place. Investment in the railways is now at its highest level for 25 years—since the conversion from steam to diesel. We are looking at an investment in British Rail of £3·7 billion over the next three years. Investment in public transport over the next three years will be about the same as central Government investment in roads. I recognise the environmental advantages of investment in public transport, although where we have slow-moving traffic on congested roads, investment in roads can also bring environmental benefits, and we have a balance in Government policy between public transport and roads.

Mr. Pike: I in no way oppose investment in motorways. I am fighting for the extension of motorways in my own area, so I do not dispute the Minister's point.

Mr. Portillo: That is marvellous. We are even closer together than I supposed; we share our balanced policy.

The hon. Gentleman was generous enough to mention some of the new services available in the north-west. The Windsor link became fully operational last year. It is now possible for through journeys to be made, for example, between Bolton, Blackpool and Stockport, without the need to transfer between Victoria and Piccadilly stations. Manchester Piccadilly station has benefited from a successful remodelling and resignalling scheme to improve the approaches to the station.

Manchester airport will have a direct rail link which is due to be operational in the financial year 1992-93. I am happy to confirm that that is my information to the hon. Member for Burnley. That link will provide direct services from such places as Leeds and Hull as well as from Manchester. I know that the hon. Gentleman is looking for access from the south as well. The frontier always moves on when the Government do what they are asked to do. However, I know that he welcomes the decision on that link.

British Rail is also considering other cases for electrification around the north-west, including Hooton to Chester and Blackpool to Manchester. The hon. Member for Burnley was concerned that there were no electrified services to Blackpool. The north-west is also benefiting from investment in modern diesel rolling stock. Pacer, sprinters and super sprinters are in service in that area and they will be joined in due course by the new class 158 express vehicles which will offer inter-city levels of comfort, air conditioning and 90 mph running.

By 1993-94, the whole of British Rail's provincial sector fleet will be either electric multiple units or the new generation diesels, apart from some stock kept on hand for special requirements such as football special excursions. To achieve that, more than £400 million has been invested in the provincial sector rolling stock over the past few years and a further £340 million is planned over the next three years. That is a story of Government support for British Rail investment, and investment is the keystone to the strategy in the provincial sector.

New investment means greater reliability, lower maintenance and running costs, an enhanced quality of service and an opportunity to increase the receipts and revenue from the passengers attracted on to the services. Reduced costs and increased revenue mean that services can be maintained with a reduced call on the taxpayer in the way of subsidy. However, I recognise that large subsidies will continue to be needed for the provincial services for the foreseeable future. Indeed, even at the end of British Rail's current corporate plan in 1992-93, we are looking at public sector subsidy of £300 million to the provincial sector.

However, I recognise that some services in the north-west are not nearly as good as they should be, not least because the class 158 express units have been late in delivery. Therefore, some services have not been as good as they should have been because the life-expired diesels running on some routes have been breaking down. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman's constituents, among others, have probably suffered as a result of that.

None the less, it is worth noting that currently revenue is 15 per cent. to 20 per cent. above the corresponding period in the previous year. There has been an increase of about 11 per cent. in Manchester PTE, and it appears that there has been considerable growth, mainly in off-peak periods. The conclusion that I draw from that is that services are at least attractive enough to bring in new customers. Otherwise, people would be voting with their feet.

As we are considering rail services in the north-west, I am proud of the fact that the Government have now approved the grant to be made to the Manchester Metrolink scheme. That £110 million scheme will provide a new rail-based public transport system within the Manchester area. It will offer services between Altrincham and Bury and will run on on-street track linking Manchester's two main railway stations. That will be an innovatory public transport system, and I am pleased that it will be designed, built and operated in the private sector but with a large subsidy from the public sector.

Moving a little outside the area to which the hon. Member for Burnley referred, we have issued credit approvals that will allow the Merseyside PTE to modernise the signalling and information systems on the Merseyrail network. The total cost of about £24 million will be staged over four years. British Rail will be able to cut running costs, and passengers will benefit from more reliable services and information.

Following the King's Cross fire, we have also given priority to a programme of works, costing initially about £14 million, to update the underground parts of Merseyrail for the better protection of passengers, staff, infrastructure and equipment. Credit approvals have been issued, and also, exceptionally, capital grant of £376,000.

The hon. Gentleman referred to inter-city services. He talked about the service on the west coast main line. As he knows, the fastest journey time to Manchester is just under two and a half hours, to Liverpool just over two and a half hours, and to Carlisle about four hours. From May, most services from London to the north-west will be operated with trains that are capable of running at 110 mph, and there will be an hourly service between London and Liverpool. The line will benefit over the next year from additional rolling stock and extra trains released by the electrification of the east coast main line.

The hon. Gentleman made an interesting point when he said that the east coast main line already provides higher speeds than the west coast main line. He is right, but the crucial factor in determining the speed of the line is not so much whether it is electrified, as the layout, the straightness of the tracks and the number of flat junctions that trains encounter. The Government are looking for good economic cases that show that electrification justifies itself. There is often a misunderstanding, which is not shared by the hon. Gentleman, that electrification is the key to speed. Electrification may be the key to more reliable services and lower operating costs, and it is on that basis that it tends to justify itself.

The hon. Gentleman referred also to Channel tunnel services. Section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 does not prevent public investment in Channel tunnel rail services. It prevents the Government from subsidising that investment. In other words, it must be an investment that justifies itself with a commercial rate of return.

The hon. Gentleman referred to section 40 of the Channel Tunnel Act which sets out British Rail's current views of commercially viable services through the tunnel. As he knows, BR's proposals were based on extensive regional consultation prior to drawing up the plan. For passenger services it is important to recognise that people from places with fast, frequent inter-city services to London will find it convenient to change to inter-capital trains, so BR plans comparatively few daytime trains from the regions.

Notwithstanding that, BR plans a daily service to Paris each morning from Manchester, calling at Stockport and Crewe, where there will be connections with Liverpool services, and a return service each evening with a similar daily service to Brussels. There will also be an overnight service calling at Carlisle, Lancaster, Preston and Crewe.

On the freight side, British Rail recognises that about 70 per cent. of traffic will pass beyond London to the regions. It is anxious to compete in that important market, but clearly it can run only commercially viable services. It is planning a regional freight terminal for the north-west, but it has not yet decided on the site. I understand, though, that British Rail hopes to announce the locations of the terminals during this year. A train operating centre is also planned at Crewe.

Although I recognise the hon. Gentleman's impatience for decisions to be made, there are three years to go. Decisions are being taken in a timely way. Certainly British Rail's section 40 plan will be kept under review and it will be the subject of further consultation. BR would certainly welcome information from the hon. Gentleman's local businesses and other concerns that would enable it accurately to assess the developing demand for international services.

The hon. Gentleman was concerned also about some particular points. I share his ambition that Preston station should be made ever more accessible to disabled people. I very much hope that a way can be found to achieve that.

I was pleased that the hon. Gentleman welcomed the change from the two-tiered structure of Burnley station to a single-level facility. All facilities will be merged at platform level. That will enable British Rail to reduce the number of staff required, but no exact decisions have yet been taken on the details of that. British Rail has made it clear that it intends to maintain the opening hours of the booking office to at least the present level.

I also hope that the refurbishment of Burnley station can proceed in a timely way. There has been a joint operation between Lancashire county council, which has provided some of the finance, and British Rail, which has provided the bulk of it. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman has welcomed some of the results. I share his disappointment that vandals have been at work to destroy some of the good work that has been done. British Rail has had to defer some of the work that it hoped to do but, providing that Lancashire county council can come up with its part of the finance in the coming year, I understand that British Rail will be able to improve Burnley Central station and one other station. Despite the disappointing news that the programme of refurbishment will move more slowly than we would have hoped, it seems that there is a good chance that Burnley station and one other will benefit from the improvement programme in the coming year.

It has been a great pleasure to debate these matters with the hon. Gentleman. The review that I have given shows that a great deal of work is being done in the north-west area to improve services and stations. That is possible only under a Government who are committed to public transport and are prepared to see the railways invest massively for the future.

Rutland Water

1 pm

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Rutland water in my constituency is the largest man-made lake in Europe. It is a reservoir which provides the water supply of 450,000 people. It provides recreation and enjoyment for many walkers, cyclists, horse riders, sailors, fishermen and wind surfers and is an internationally famous bird sanctuary and nature reserve. It provides employment and a living to several small businesses and is a major amenity for the east midlands as a whole.

On 7 September last, Anglian Water announced an immediate ban on sailing and warned people to keep away from the water's edge and especially to keep animals away. The reason for the ban was the weird blue-green algae which had been building up progressively on the surface of the water and at the water's edge over the previous few weeks.

I had only just returned from holiday that day, but the following morning, 8 September, I went to Rutland water with the district manager of Anglian Water, Mr. John Green. At that time fishing was continuing, but by the afternoon of that day it had been banned. A major competition scheduled for that weekend was cancelled. The closure remained in force until 18 October and resulted in great financial hardship for the small businesses and clubs which depend on the water. As far as I am aware, they have not been compensated in any way.

The closure of the reservoir was sparked off by the death of 23 lambs and at least 15 dogs. It is worth examining the chronology of the death of the lambs owned by my constituent, Mr. Renner, at Normanton Lodge farm. The first eight deaths occurred on 21 August. Mr. Renner collected a sample of algae which was then very visible and took it with two dead lambs to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food veterinary centre in Lincoln. All the lambs that died had blue-green algae on them. There were further deaths over the weekend of 26 to 28 August and on 4, 5 and 6 September.

The death of the dogs was also spread over several days. Some vets originally thought that they had eaten the rat poison warfarin because the horrible symptoms were similar to those which occur with such poisoning. There have been persistent local rumours since that that remains the cause. As recently as last month, a local councillor passed to me an allegation that someone had seen warfarin on the ground round the edge of the water. I have asked the water company about that allegation, but it was specifically denied in a telephone call to me last Friday by the managing director, Mr. John Simpson.

On 8 September, the day after the closure, the Leicester Mercury reported the affair. It quoted a spokeswoman for Anglian Water as saying that the public water supplies were not affected by the algae. She added:

> "The treatment process deals with the blue-green algae. It will have no effect on the drinking water."

The same day, the newspaper quoted Dr. Garry Whitelam of the university of Leicester saying that several forms of the algae were toxic, that it was a worldwide problem, and that there were three different kinds of cyanobacteria, one of them a liver toxin which had caused catle deaths in other countries, another a neurotoxin which had caused convulsions and spasms in mammals and another a skin irritant known as swimmer's itch. If that was known to Dr. Whitelam, it should presumably have been known to Anglian Water.

On the day I visited the reservoir, I was specifically assured by Anglian Water that there was no danger to public water supplies and that the algae had been caused by the long dry spell of weather. I was told that it was an entirely natural phenomenon resulting from nutrients in the rivers which were pumped into the reservoir interacting with the sun.

However, I was not fully satisfied by those explanations, and directly after the weekend I wrote to Lord Crickhowell, the chairman of the National Rivers Authority, asking him to undertake an investigation. I also spoke on the telephone to his chief executive, Dr. John Bowman. I questioned Dr. Bowman closely about whether the problem had been made worse by discharges of phosphates into the rivers Welland and Nene or by the sewage being discharged from Okeham sewage works. He confirmed that discharges of that kind would certainly add to the process of eutrophication and thereby to the nutrient content of the water.

Since then I have been in continual correspondence with the chairman of Anglian Water, Mr. Bernard Henderson, with Lord Crickhowell of the NRA and with Ministers. I have been to see two Ministers, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), and my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier). I made a brief speech in the House on 13 November and I have asked numerous oral and written questions. However, I am still completely dissatisfied with the co-ordination and scope of the investigations.

When I went to see my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe, I felt great unease about the co-ordination between the NRA, which did not know the result of the post mortems on the sheep or the dogs, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, which had not supplied information from its veterinary service to the Department of the Environment, and the Department of the Environment itself, which did not seem to know much at all, even about the important researches of Professor Geoffrey Codd at Dundee university.

However, a number of facts have emerged. First, the post mortem on Mr. Renner's lambs carried out by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food's veterinary service confirmed that microcystin toxin has been found in the liver and rumen contents.

Secondly, a substantial amount of scientific materials about algal poisoning is available in learned journals, mostly in the United States. For example, a note on algal toxins in Wisconsin waters experiencing blue-green algal blooms, written by three water scientists, appears in the 1988 edition of Lake and Reservoir Management. That is all on public deposit in the United States and it is widely available. The 1976 edition of "Black's", the standard veterinary dictionary in Britain also has an article on algal poisoning and is available in the library of MAFF's veterinary service with which MAFF vets are familiar, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food admitted to me on 24 January in a parliamentary answer. The recent learned paper by Professor Codd has five pages of references to other works on the subject.

Thirdly, I have not seen any post mortems on the dogs, but the Parliamentary Secretary told me on 11 January that two dead dogs had been examined by MAFF vets and that their deaths may have been linked to the ingestion of blue-green algal toxins.

Fourthly, the NRA, which is conducting an investigation which I hope will be published shortly, has confirmed that the principal species associated with the toxic blooms on Rutland water was microcystis acruginosa, which produces the toxin microcystin.

In the past few days, Anglian Water has sent me two reports which I intend to treat as public and which I understand have been given to the Department of the Environment and to Rutland district council. One of them hums and hahs at considerable length about the causes of the disaster last August and September and refers to the work of Professor Codd at Dundee university. It admits that the first report about the scum from toxic blooms was published as long ago as 1878, following the death of domestic animals. It says that none of the post mortems on the animals that died at Rutland water is conclusive, but it admits:

> "the symptoms described are consistent with microcystin poisoning."

It accepts that phosphate and nitrate are key nutrients and that phosphate concentrations rose slightly in Rutland water in 1989 because of increased pumping from the Rivers Welland and Nene during a dry summer.

The report suggests that there must have been special factors at Rutland water to account for the heavier scum than at other reservoirs, which it blames on local physical features such as the prevailing winds or water movements. It adds that additional biologists and biological technicians are being recruited and that extra treatment is being installed at Oakham sewage treatment works

> "to remove the minor load of phosphate."

However, the report admits:

> "it is therefore possible that given similar climatic conditions, blue-green algal blooms could develop during the interim, including the coming summer."

There follow three extraordinary sentences:

> "It seems likely from the evidence that healthy fish caught at the time of a microcystin bloom are probably safe to eat. However, if an angler has any doubts, it is open to him or her not to eat the fish. If more specific advice can be given at the time of an incident such advice will be made available."

Not many people will regard those statements as helpful or reassuring.

Anglian Water's second report concerns water supply. It is worth remembering that, at every stage, Anglian Water said that the drinking water was safe. The report is hard to understand and is full of endless qualifications about the difficulty of comprehending data and whether the scientific results are satisfactory. According to the report, there was a brief period, from mid-October to 1 November 1989, when some possible microcystin in the filtered, final water was measured at up to 16 mg per litre on one particular day, compared with less than 1 mg in late September 1989.

The scientists seem unsure whether their experiments are valid, whether the element really was microcystin or what they call pseudo-microcystin, or why some of the treated water had a higher concentration of it than the untreated water. Clearly, the experts are very sceptical about the findings. They say that there remains a strong possibility that the compound reported as microcystin was wrongly identified, and report that work is continuing. They conclude that the water did not contain—this is the vital point—microcystin at levels harmful to health. They make proposals, including the use of granular activated carbon, for an additional form of treatment if another major problem arises in the future.

There is no need to be alarmist about those vague, confusing and possibly incorrect findings, but my constituents and I are entitled to a specific answer—yes or no—from my hon. Friend the Minister to two simple questions. First, was the treated water at all times absolutely safe to drink last autumn, as the Anglian Water spokesman said publicly on several occasions? Secondly, has the water been absolutely safe to drink at all times since, including now? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will answer unequivocally yes to both questions. If he cannot do so, the chairman of Anglian Water should resign immediately.

The very fact that I have to ask such questions shows how unsatisfactory the whole affair has been. It has revealed indecisiveness, defensiveness and inadequate research and action by Anglian Water. The Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have shown nothing like enough energy or determination in getting to the bottom of this disgraceful affair.

The Government have a duty to take action in five respects. First, they should establish an independent public inquiry under a High Court judge to determine whether that environmental disaster could have been prevented, its causes, whether the company was negligent or blame worthy. That inquiry should begin as soon as possible and report by the autumn. Last summer, 38 animals died—supposing a child had fallen out of a boat?

Secondly, the Minister should offer the full resources of Government scientific knowledge and advice, and if necessary fund additional research facilities at Dundee university or elsewhere. Department and NRA scientists should be sent at once to the United States to discuss findings with their American colleagues, who have great expertise in the subject.

Thirdly, the National Rivers Authority should be instructed to produce its own reports by the end of this month at the latest with specific recommendations.

Fourthly, the Minister should demand a full checklist for action from Anglian Water as to how it intends to prevent a repetition of the disaster this coming summer.

Finally, Anglian Water should immediately pay ex gratia compensation to all those people who lost animals and to business men who lost money because of the closure. If the commission of inquiry which I suggested finds Anglian Water blameworthy, the ex gratia sums could be augmented by the courts.

I hope that it will be clear to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that I have a deep sense of frustration and anger about this affair. Before I leave the House at the next general election, I intend to ensure that the matter has finally been settled and that public concern is fully allayed. I look to my hon. Friend for a full response today.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on securing this debate and on pursuing this issue with his characteristic persistence and vigour. I fully understand his desire to protect his constituents and to try to get to the bottom of this complex issue. I hope during my remarks to answer the points that he put to me.

It might be helpful to the House if I first say a few words about the nature of the algae of concern here, and recap on the events of last year.

As my hon. Friend knows, algae are minute aquatic plants which grow naturally in all surface waters. Their growth is determined by combinations of environmental factors such as sunlight, the length of day, temperature, nutrients and so on. With the constantly changing conditions in a lake, a succession of different species will thrive. There are more than 1,000 species of such algae in Britain. Towards autumn, the species which often dominate are of the blue-green type which is the subject of today's debate.

Although this succession rarely causes problems, under some conditions a so-called "bloom" of algae will occur. That is what happened at Rutland and in some other lakes last summer. Most algae are completely innocuous and are necessary for the life of the lake, but a few individual species of blue-green algae produce a toxic substance which can be released to the water. Microcystis is one of those algae and the toxin microcystin is sometimes, although not always, produced. We do not yet know of the mechanism by which this toxin is produced, nor the conditions favourable for its production.

Last year's problems of blue-green algae became apparent when reports were received in September of a small number of deaths in dogs and sheep following contact with Rutland water in my hon. Friend's constituency. Before 1989, we were not aware of any recorded incidents of adverse effects within the Anglian region.

Anglian Water's account of events shows that its biological monitoring of Rutland water in July and early August showed relatively low algal numbers in the main body of the reservoir. But following the reports of those animal deaths at the end of August and in September, Anglian Water carried out further sampling of algal scum, which was identified mainly as the blue-green algae microcystis. It then sought advice from Professor Codd at Dundee university on its toxicity.

By 7 September, Anglian had decided that there was sufficient circumstantial evidence available to show that the scum was toxic and could be hazardous. It therefore closed the reservoir to recreational activities and sought advice from veterinary specialists on the cause of the animal deaths.

For its part, the National Rivers Authority responded quickly. The Authority carried out extensive sampling of some 750 reservoirs and similar waters in England and Wales, to test for the presence of toxic blue-green algae; 53 of them in England were found to contain algae of toxic forms.

Secondly, having identified the areas at risk, the NRA suggested to site owners that they should consider taking a number of precautions, which they did. Apart from advising site owners on the action to take, the NRA of course informed local environmental health officers of its findings and advice. Finally, the NRA instituted a detailed analysis and review of last year's events.

As for the public health effects, Anglian Water concluded, on the basis of the evidence available that there was no hazard to public health from drinking water supplied from the two treatment works fed by Rutland water. Our medical advisers are unable to give definitive advice because of the unreliability of the analytical information available and the absence of any reliable toxicological data for algal toxins. They agree, however, that water from Rutland put into supply for drinking after treatment is extremely unlikely to pose a threat to health. No adverse human health effects have subsequently been reported as arising from Rutland water's problems.

The algae were concentrated at the shallow margins of the reservoir. Water for treatment is drawn from 15m deep in the main body of the reservoir, where algal concentrations were relatively low. Furthermore, the comprehensive water treatment facilities, which include the use of granular activated carbon filtration at the two Rutland treatment works, are likely to have removed any algal toxins which may have been present in the raw water.

My hon. Friend has drawn attention to the report just issued by Anglian Water Services Ltd. which sets out its views and analysis of last year's problems and what needs to be done in the future. A number of Anglian's comments will be echoed in my remarks today. One of the report's main conclusions is that more data are required to produce a reliable determination of the longer-term significance of algal blooms and the production of toxins.

The detection of microcystin in water is a complex analytical process all of its own. That is why conclusions and recommendations must be qualified and must not go ahead of the available scientific evidence. Anglian Water Services Ltd. also concluded that, so far, post mortems have proved inconclusive, although circumstantial evidence strongly suggests that algal toxins were the cause of death of the animals concerned.

The report also concluded that no significant increases in nutrients occurred last year, so it suggests that climatic conditions were the major contributory factor for algal growth.

On the available evidence, the report concludes that drinking water did not contain toxin at levels which cause harm to health, although it draws attention to difficulties in interpreting uncertain analytical information about the presence of microcystin in drinking water.

Finally, the report set out Anglian Water's future proposals, which include an improved monitoring programme, investment to reduce the levels of phosphate inputs into Rutland water, greater use of granular activated carbon treatment for drinking water and suitable arrangements for warning local people of the risks if algal blooms recur. This report is both constructive and helpful.

It was against that background that the National Rivers Authority set up a task group last year to investigate the blue-green algae problem. The terms of reference of the group are very wide. They are to assess the problems that occurred last year at Rutland water and elsewhere; to assess the extent of the problem, not just in the United Kingdom but abroad; to review the influence of nutrients; to review the influence of water quality management techniques; to review the influence of biotic factors; to identify the research and development requirements; to assess the staff resource implications; and to make recommendations for monitoring and eutrophication control to minimise the problem in future.

The task group is being chaired by Mr. Pearson of the NRA's Anglian region. It also includes Professor G. A. Codd of the university of Dundee, a leading expert in blue-green algae, Dr. Reynolds of the Institute of Freshwater Ecology and Mr. Fawell of the Water Research Centre, who is a toxicologist. My hon. Friend will agree that it is a wide-ranging inquiry conducted by experts.

The group intends to produce its report by early summer, but I cannot accede to my hon. Friend's request that it should be accelerated and produced by the end of the month. It will be produced before the main season for the development of blue-green algae. The group has contacted all NRA regions, water plcs and water companies that operate lakes and reservoirs.

In addition, since similar problems have been reported in a number of other countries, information is being collected from sources overseas and, as part of the NRA's research effort, the WRC is carrying out a full literature search and review.

I hope that that meets the point made specifically by my hon. Friend. I promise him that the group will aim to collate and review the problems and recommend future action to be taken. Research needs have to be indentified and budgeted within the NRA's programme to investigate the problem and produce effective systems for monitoring and control.

My hon. Friend will understand from my earlier remarks that it is simply not possible to prevent the growth of algae, as they are a naturally occurring phenomenon. Nevertheless, the task group considers that it is possible to take preventive action to reduce risk. It is therefore preparing a scheme to identify those lakes with the potential for problems. The group is devising a sampling programme which will categorise lakes used for public supply and immersion sports according to the risk of algal blooms occurring. A proportion of high-risk lakes will be subject to routine sampling and, by applying criteria for phosphate levels and algal content, it will be possible to inform owners when it would be advisable to take stock of the situation in the waters under their control and to make plans to minimise the risks.

As I have said, there is no record of damage to health via drinking water, despite the widespread occurrence of algal blooms. Nevertheless, I consider that there is an urgent need to improve our knowledge of the toxic effects of microcystin and to develop a reliable methodology for the detection and analysis of the toxin. Research is currently being carried out by Professor Codd for the water industry to develop improved analytical techniques for microcystin. We shall build upon his work to investigate the potential risks to consumers' health from the occurrence of algal toxins in drinking water.

These are vital steps in broadening our knowledge of the subject which, together with the work that the NRA is already undertaking, will provide a valuable base from which to consider the development of standards for algal toxins in drinking water.

I recognise my hon. Friend's concern about the issue. I entirely agree that we need to obtain the best possible picture of what took place last year. However, it is a complex matter. We must rely on good science to produce the answers. We must not rush ahead with hasty conclusions that are not supported by research. We are determined to get to the bottom of what occurred and, perhaps more importantly, what can be done if the problem recurs. In the light of that, and the fact that the NRA investigation already under way, I am satisfied that all possible steps are being taken to inquire into that unfortunate and tragic incident in my hon. Friend's constituency, and that the necessary follow-up action is in hand.

Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990

Nottingham Park Estate Act 1990.

Child Abuse

1.30 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I wish to raise a serious aspect of child abuse that has caused increasing anxiety. I refer to ritualistic sex abuse, which certainly causes concern within the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and which was raised by it at a recent press conference. The matter is of significant social importance, as I am sure the Minister will recognise.

As a member of the central executive committee of the society, I felt that I should seek an opportunity to pursue the matter. In some quarters it may be rather fashionable to take a relaxed view about aspects of child welfare: that view was illustrated in an article in The Evening Standard last Tuesday week, which suggested that the NSPCC should take care that it does not harm people's liberties in the relentless campaign against people's vices. However, if there is a real or potential abuse of children, are not the society, the House and the Government under an obligation to take a serious view? It seems that that rather dismissive view of the society's record of vigilant concern was expressed in response to the recent press conference.

I was alerted to the problem two or three years ago when the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe considered a report from the legal affairs committee. It was a factual report, restrained in its approach, but nevertheless entirely horrifying. It contained information about the abduction and misuse of children internationally, and about the trade in obscene video films involving children. I was astonished to learn of the scale of the trade in western Europe and the United States.

From the report, I learned that people took holidays to places such as Bangkok, where wealthy citizens from countries such as our own could satisfy their paedophilic tastes. Children could be purchased as sexual objects and holiday sex toys. Against that awareness of evil, I was not so shocked about the matter aired by the NSPCC, and by others concerned about the development of ritual sex abuse.

What has been revealed is intolerable. The purpose of my debate is to ensure that the Administration perceive the evil and are committed to respond to it. I trust that the Minister will consider the view that the incidence of ritualistic sex abuse is likely to be significantly larger than the number of cases so far established. Perhaps he will accept that those involved, while perverse and evil, are likely to possess a degree of cunning to disguise their practice and to operate securely.

The article to which I referred earlier mentioned the society's fear that some parents were compelling their children to watch video nasties, and suggested that the evidence was entirely anecdotal. Evidence is difficult to secure, and it has often been difficult to present it within the context of prosecution. Perhaps the new arrangements will make the pursuit of legal action more meaningful. Although evidence about ritualistic sex abuse is not easy to obtain, sufficient is available fully to justify the society's anxiety, to justify my raising the matter here and to justify the call for adequate recognition by the Government.

There have been at least five successful prosecutions in the past couple of years, which were referred to in a serious article in The Independent on Sunday on 16 March. One parent, described as a devil worshipper, was sentenced at the Old Bailey to imprisonment for the ritual abuse of seven children, including his own son or daughter. In another case, nine adults were imprisoned by the court in Nottingham on 53 charges of incest, indecent assault and cruelty against 21 children. One child was cut and the rest were required to drink his blood during a period that the children spent in what was described as a vortex of cruelty.

At the Old Bailey in 1980, an old lady was sentenced after she had imprisoned a girl and forced her to engage in black magic and sexual activity. Three men and a woman were sentenced at Chester about 18 months ago for vile activity involving children aged between three and 12. Last year, at Winchester, two men, one described as a practising Satanist, were imprisoned for incest, indecent assault and gross indecency with children from their own families. Those cases are not anecdotal.

Nor can one wholly dismiss the views of a clergyman mentioned in the article to which I have just referred, who said that he knew of girls who had been impregnated to serve ritualistic purposes, or the views of a woman involved in Childwatch, who was reported as having said that she had spoken to 40 children from various parts of the country who had been victims of such abuse. Others from different localities appear to have encountered child victims or other evidence of abuse. That is mentioned in the growing anxieties of experienced officers of the NSPCC.

The society has conducted a survey of its child protection teams. A questionnaire was sent from Saffron Hill, the society's headquarters, last autumn. As the Minister will be aware, the respondents are experienced, responsible and qualified men and women of considerable ability. They noted that it is difficult to secure information, that the practices are necessarily carried out in secret, that the children are fearful of punishment or sanction should they give information and that they may have been almost brainwashed to ensure no disclosures.

Some of the responses from the NSPCC's officers have led to serious concern being expressed. Nine teams have worked, or are currently working, with children who have been subjected to ritualistic sexual abuse. In recent months, four cases have been referred to the society by the police or local authority social services departments. Responses specify that one, two or 15 or 16 or more children have been involved in a group practising these rituals. One respondent said that up to 20 children could be involved in such ceremonies at any one time.

The reports from the society's officers provide some information about the sick activities that are involved. Five of the responses refer to children drinking blood or urine, five to the killing or abuse of animals, and five to the invocation of supernatural powers and the use of masks and costumes. In four cases, faeces were smeared on children's bodies, and in some cases children were held under water. There have been seven reports of threats made to maintain control of children. In several cases, dolls have been mutilated as part of the ritual. Other bizarre elements are recorded. Some children were made to eat what was said to be part of a human heart, while others were shown what was said to be a baby in a microwave oven.

Seven NSPCC teams said that they had worked with sexually abused children who had described symptoms or given reliable accounts of ritualistic activities, including attendance at events where adults had sex before them or where they had been made to eat faeces or to take part in other disgraceful activities. The work of the NSPCC officers and others involved in helping such abused children is not easy, because the abusers tend to have a psychological hold on the children involved which may make them extremely fearful to talk about their experience to others.

It is likely to be extremely difficult to secure factual evidence. It may be rather more difficult than in many activities to establish the facts and to obtain evidence. More children may face such experiences than has been fully established so far. I hope that the House will bear that suspicion in mind as a serious aspect of the matter. I have been told that an NSPCC officer was recently threatened when he was seeking information about activities which he felt should be obtained to assist the child with whom he was concerned.

I am not about to suggest that we are now seeing the tip of an iceberg, but there are grounds for suspicion that such abuse is more frequent than one would have imagined a few years ago. The fact that there have been prosecutions of such cases of evil in different areas seems to justify my suggestion. As able and active officers of the society in various areas are concerned, it suggests that it would be foolish if there were to be a public assumption that the incidence of this evil is slight. I am also sure that the House will agree that even one case is too many. The experience of some children is so horrifying that society cannot readily allow any incidence of such experience to be ignored. Recent evidence suggests that child sex abuse is far more extensive than would have been assumed only a few years ago, and there is no reason for anyone to consider that ritualistic abuse is so odd, extreme or evil that it can exist only in fevered imagination.

These rituals may relate to satanism, to black magic or to devil worship. Such practices may involve ritual, ceremony, fancy words, mumbo-jumbo, strange equipment and weird activities. They may have no general appeal and they may be seen as neither sensible nor tasteful. However, we live in a free country and it would be inappropriate for Parliament or society to seek to interfere with or to outlaw such activities when they involve consenting adults. Such activities may be regarded as ridiculous, and if they became widespread it might be regarded as sad for the nation. However, we may be confident that there is sufficient common sense in this country to ensure that such activities remain a minority taste. Yet common sense must also apply to the protection of children.

There is evidence of evil practices involving children, so society and the House must make it clear that the abuse of children as part of such activities must not happen and that, if it does, resources will be made available to ensure that society provides a proper response.

I hope that the Minister will accept that I have taken a view which, although it might properly be regarded as stern, has not departed from balance. Whatever may be said of my view, I hope that those of the society and of the public and the voluntary organisations involved in child welfare will command respect.

In many ways, our society is nastier, greedier and more violent than it was in the earlier post-war period. I could give reasons for that, but I should not stray too far from the subject before us. Perhaps some of the possible causes of these undesirable developments will one day receive rather more attention. I hope that it will be one day soon. At this stage, I merely make the point that children—perhaps in larger numbers than might have been expected—have been abused or are at risk of abuse from these ritualistic sources and the public response needs to be clear and adequate.

I also want to put it on record that organisations such as the NSPCC—there are other deserving and responsible bodies serving the same cause—and the various professional people and volunteers involved in societies that care for children are fulfilling an essential role. Such groups must continue to receive that priority of public esteem and support that is necessary to enable them to provide the services, help and protection that so many of the nation's children sadly require.

Children are not only their parents' obligation; they are the nation's children as well, and I trust that the Minister will acknowledge that. Governments, parties and politicians may believe that people must stand on their own feet and take responsibility for themselves, but it would be negligent folly if such a rule were applied to children. I hope that the Minister will recognise that public responsibility is substantial, that decency in the treatment of children will continue to be firmly required, and that the abuse of children for perverse purposes of satanism and ritual must lead to firm sanctions being applied.

The Minister for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): The House owes a debt of appreciation to the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) for raising this important subject. It is a constant source of horror and shock that, in a modern society, children continue to be abused and neglected.

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has played a central role in the evolution of services for the care and treatment of children who have been abused and their families. It has once again identified an area which may have seemed inconceivable to some members of the public but on which sufficient attention needs to be focused. Over the past 106 years, the NSPCC—like many other voluntary organisations—has developed services and earned itself a proud name. It is greatly respected by us all.

In congratulating the hon. Gentleman, I should like to take him back five years, to the time when I introduced an Adjournment debate on precisely this subject, motivated in large measure by the increasing amount of information that was being produced by the NSPCC. I referred then to what the enlightened founder of the NSPCC, Benjamim Waugh, said at the turn of the century:

> "It is better to remove evil from the home than to remove the child."

That view is part and parcel of modern thinking on child abuse.

Mr. Hardy: The Minister referred to her own debate on the subject. That leads me to comment that concern for children's welfare stretches to hon. Members on both sides of the House, as evidenced by the fact that the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) has been a member of the central executive committee of the society for longer than me and has given it distinguished service.

Mrs. Bottomley: Yes. My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) continually raises subjects of this nature.

Frankly, there can be no room for party division in respect of child abuse, and that was borne out during the passage of the Children Act 1989. All hon. Members believe strongly that children should be entitled to a childhood free of sexual or physical abuse or of neglect. All that we know about the long-standing effects of abuse in childhood leads us to conclude that it is a thoroughly vile crime. We should not be satisfied until we have stamped it out.

The hon. Member for Wentworth raised the disturbing issue of the ritualistic abuse of children. The Government are aware of the concern about ritualistic abuse expressed by those handling child abuse cases. Through the social services inspectorate, the Department is monitoring the situation to assess the scale of the problem. I will consider at length the particular points raised by the hon. Member for Wentworth.

In November 1989 the Department arranged a meeting with representatives from the NSPCC, with whom we work closely, Childline, the Children's Society and the Association of Directors of Social Services. It became clear from our discussions that there is a need to obtain more information about ritual child abuse and child abuse networks in general. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that that work is being carried forward.

The Department is well aware of the difficulties facing the statutory agencies when they handle such cases. Where networks have been discovered, close co-operation has developed between social workers and the police. Joint co-operation in investigations is always central to child abuse cases where obtaining evidence and establishing the facts is fraught with difficulty. That co-operation ensures that children can be interviewed sensitively and protected effectively.

So often, a child's abuse can almost be exaggerated or consolidated by the effects of the investigation. The sensitive handling of the investigations and the court hearing process, while protecting fair justice, must also give proper regard to the child's needs.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Will the Minister ponder the fact that in many cases the simple fact that a child has received attention from the abuser highlights that that is probably the only form of positive attention that some children receive? In some instances, the neglect has been so great that the only care, even though that care was misplaced, vile, vicious and criminal, came from the abuser. It is difficult to get a child to realise then the iniquity of the incident and to appreciate that it should not have happened.

Mrs. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman shows a profound awareness of the details of child abuse cases. Such cases on the whole do not occur in isolation. They are part of a pattern of family interactions. The child must be considered not simply with regard to one traumatic incident, but in the context of his or her life and experience. It is important that handling abuse cases does not inadvertently consolidate the disadvantage that the child has suffered. So often that is borne out in the summary removal of a child.

The Children Act 1989 makes it clear that a child should not be removed from home unless it is essential for the child's safety and welfare. Very often the preferable course is to remove the perpetrator or potential perpetrator of the offence rather than the child, who frequently is left feeling responsible or guilty. That may sound perverse, but those involved in child abuse would recognise those responses.

We appreciate that we must give further consideration to ritual child abuse. However, it should be seen as part of the wider problem of child abuse in general. Once a new area of concern is identified, so often the professionals involved, the families and the public begin to identify and piece together parts of a jigsaw puzzle that was sometimes previously too horrific even to be contemplated. Once again, the NSPCC has served the public well by placing on the agenda an aspect that some people previously thought did not even bear contemplation.

Regrettably, there is little new about child abuse and neglect. The use of pathological terms to describe its roots, causes and effects and the media's preoccupation with horrific cases should not obscure its long-standing nature or delude us into thinking that its incidence and characteristics are any different now from what has been described in literature over the years. Descriptions of barbarous treatment are widespread in literature and popular culture. There are frequent tales of infanticide, ritual sacrifice, mutilation, starvation, flogging and exploitation. It is only relatively recently that a child has been thought to have any right not to be abused or neglected.

I notice that dogs are among the hon. Gentleman's interests. He will be aware, as we are all aware, that the legislation to protect animals was on the statute book decades before the first legislation to protect children.

Mr. Hardy: I was aware of that, but the Minister might care to note that the people who were responsible for the legislation to protect children tended to be the people who had sought to protect animals. There was no distinction in the early days.

Mrs. Bottomley: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. Those who combined the protection of dogs and children in their interests clearly had sympathetic, kindly and sensitive personalities.

The Government attach high priority to the problem of child abuse and in recent years have embarked on a comprehensive programme to tackle it. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the important part that is played by the Children Act. We had on the statute book a motley number of laws concerned with children. They were built up piecemeal over the years, and they were complex and confusing for professionals and familes alike.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, steered through the House the important Children Act, which sets a framework that integrates and provides a coherent set of laws to clarify the welfare of the child and the role of the parents and of the local authority, and it sets a much better framework for partnership. Above all, it maintains that the child's interests must always be paramount. All hon. Members would endorse that.

The Department is involved in a major training programme. The establishment of legislation on the statute book is not sufficent to ensure that the law turns into good practice. Before October 1991, we must be satisfied that all those involved in child protection and child care and all those in the judical system are aware of the detail and the implications of the new legislation.

We have a training support programme for social workers, currently giving training in child protection to more than 70,000 social workers, and general child care training for more than 40,000 social workers. That amounts to more than £19 million this year. We are also producing guidance and detailed regulations on the Children Act. There has been a process of discussion and collaboration with the many organisations involved in child care. The NSPCC has certainly always been one such organisation with which the Department of Health has worked closely.

We are all aware that, in appalling cases in which tragedy has occurred, lessons must be learnt. Not only are the Department and agencies involved required to produce their own report for the area child protection committee; in extreme circumstances the Secretary of State will set up an inquiry, often with the great assistance of the social services inspectorate, to which I pay special tribute because of its work in investigating, advising and guiding. The inspectorate is universally respected and trusted. We are also examining the treatment of families, including abusers.

Hon. Members and Ministers may condemn child abuse, and many of us recognise that it often takes place in a family context. Facilities for the treatment of those who have been abused or who abuse are important. The Department provides assistance to the NSPCC. We are pleased to have done so over several years. We recognise its vital contribution and we respect it and continue to work with it.

I repeat my appreciation that the hon. Gentleman has raised this important issue today. It deserves our further attention. By working with him, the NSPCC and other organisations, we hope to create a society in which children grow up free from abuse and neglect.

Energy Conservation and Energy Efficiency

2 pm

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): It is always a pleasure to see my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Energy on the Front Bench ready to answer on behalf of the Government all the questions that I shall ask. The Government must give some sensible answers soon on energy conservation and efficiency. This is not a usual subject for debate in Parliament because by and large this nation, like this Parliament, has totally neglected all the sensible measures that can be taken on energy.

It is perfectly fair for British Gas or any other utility to seek to sell more of its product. The only problem comes when selling more of the product does nasty things to the environment, which we now all recognise as important. I have every respect for all the utility companies. Under their new plc logos I believe that at long last they will become energy-sensitive, whereas in the past they were simply sales-sensitive. That is in no way to detract from the excellence or efficiency of the utility companies, but as a nation we have never sought to be energy-efficient.

If one buys a refrigerator in the United States, there will be a label stuck on the side saying how much it will cost to run. In this country a label will probably be stuck on the side telling us how much more exciting, how much sexier and how much bigger it is. No one tells us the obvious truth that a big fridge costs more to run than a small fridge. We have always been hell bent on the search for turnover in the hope of a profit. Meanwhile, as we increase the sales, so we increase, for example, the greenhouse effect.

It is my happy view that the campaigner for energy efficiency and conservation—indeed, the energy environmentalist of the future—will not be seen as some pleasant woolly lady with a bobble hat on her way to Greenham Common, who is in favour of energy efficiency on the side. Instead, it will be the hard-headed, indeed perhaps hard-faced, business man with long-term plans who says, "I must plan for the future, and because I am building something"—perhaps a nuclear power station, although I hope not—"I must also think of the cost in 20 years' time of closing it down and getting rid of the waste." I am not having a go at the nuclear industry, but British industry has never been charged with the eventual cost of cleaning up its products.

We are aware of the costs of cleaning up now. We see it in the smog in the Antarctic and we all say that we are greener than thou. But we should be clean before we are green. The first place to do the cleaning is in our own industry—literally, in our own back yard—before we pollute the back yards of other countries. There is little distance between that and energy efficiency or conservation. Every time that we require a utility, whether the gas, electricity or oil industry, to produce more, we must also ask what else it will produce more of besides that which we want to buy.

In Barnstaple, youngsters are pushed around in pushchairs, at just the level for all the nasty vapours given off by the motor cars. Youngsters go swimming off our coast and when they have goggles, they do not like what they see below the surface. Our environment and its conservation and pollution are all part of the same matrix which, thank heavens, we have at last recognised.

I pay tribute to the Department of Energy, which has shaken off the sloth of some years, first under—I was about to say the premiership of, but it did not work out that way—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales when it first took an interest in the alternatives, then under my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, then under the Minister of State Department of Energy, who is now carrying on that work. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will follow the same line and say that it is not enough to produce energy or even to produce it cheaply; we must first produce it cleanly and only then cheaply because the environment costs are so high. We do not yet have any idea how or whether we shall be able to pay that particular piper.

I am the chairman of the all-party alternative energy group and it has been my great pleasure for the past six or seven years, along with the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) who is vice-chairman of the group, to work on a non-partisan basis. I am on the extreme right and he is on the extreme left, and we have met in the middle. Party political persuasion does not matter; what matters is how we persuade the globe that the search for more and more is not the answer; we must first ask at what cost.

We all talk of the unified market and the European Community. Happily, the EC appears to be facing up to some of its responsibilities. For example, it has been agreed by the Council of Ministers that the EC should improve energy efficiency by 20 per cent. between 1985 and 1995. That is a huge percentage increase, but no one has said how much that will cost. However, we must be talking of billions of pounds, all because, whether internationally at European level, nationally, or even locally in our communities, no one bothers about how much power we use because it is relatively so small a part of our total costs.

I am one of the few shopkeepers in Parliament. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) was Secretary of State for Energy and used to have his breakfast meetings around the countryside, I arranged for some of my people to attend. The only problem is that the cost of heating and lighting in our shops is relatively so small that they thought it would not be worth saving those costs. We all know the cost of our rent and various community charges, but we have never got down to the cost of energy in one's shop or business.

As we go home from the mother of Parliaments in the evening, we see great office blocks twinkling with light. Someone somewhere has given no thought to the cost of the energy that is being used or the implications of its use. We should start in the House. It may be boiling in summer and freezing or boiling in winter, but somewhere along the line we in this Chamber must give a lead and say that it is not enough to preach energy efficiency—we must practise it, too.

How do we do that? In some ways it is cheap. We can label appliances. I mentioned refrigerators in the United States. Will the Government consider, if only as a code of practice, telling manufacturers and importers of such equipment to stick a label on their goods telling the customer how much each unit will cost to run? That would be simple and easy.

I have one particular hate. This is the only country in the world that I know of where a new electrical appliance, whether a hair dryer or a toaster, never has a plug on it. People may wonder what that has to do with energy efficiency, but it has a lot to do with it. Why are we so backward in telling manufacturers to label their goods and put a plug on them? I wonder how many accidents happen when people like me do not know what wires go where because we remember the old colours.

What about lighting standards? We are probably all aware that the new soft, more expensive lights use only about 25 per cent. of the energy used by the old lights. Such bulbs will be paid for halfway through their lifetime and, thereafter, money is being saved.

We have never promoted the simple idea that energy conservation need not be expensive, and that the cost of insulating one's home properly will probably be recouped in the first year or certainly in the second. The money saved by the house owner over 10 or 15 years is almost as important as the environmental savings enjoyed by the community, in avoiding the unpleasant by-products of generating energy.

People who are buying a house are willing to pay for a structural survey, but no one considers the cost of heating it. The Department of Energy is keen on promoting energy audits, but perhaps more can be done. In the United States, an energy audit costs about $25, and for another $150, simple measures can be taken to improve insulation and to stop draughts. They are simple improvements of a type that we never get around to—like mending the staircase that always creaked in grandad's day. If energy can be conserved, fewer power stations will be required.

Whenever we want more of something, we build new capacity. The consequence is that we have more houses in this country than families even though they happen to be in the wrong place—but that is the subject of another debate. It would be a simple matter to require the vendor of a property to notify a prospective purchaser of its energy efficiency. Vendors would be likely to give more thought to that aspect before putting their property on the market—perhaps commissioning an energy audit and making improvements that they had hitherto neglected. If they did so, they would achieve a higher price for their property, and its value would also be enhanced in environmental terms.

There is a maintenance office within this building, but we should also have an energy efficiency and conservation office—as should many other major buildings. The cost of the staff would be saved many times over. Once a proper system is established, savings continue for ever.

Financial assistance always presents a problem, and I generally support the Government's view. Why should we give financial assistance for improvements that will help the owner to make money? Why should the state pay for insulation from which the householder will benefit financially in the long term? However, I should be happy to see loans made available for energy conservation purposes. Last night, we were arguing over student loans to be repaid over a number of years. It would be as good or even better to invest in insulating our housing stock.

There are many elderly people, most of them ladies on low incomes not enjoying any pension payable on their late husband's former employment, who cannot afford to live in reasonable comfort. They have to make do with the warmth provided by only one bar of an electric fire. There is no need for that. A little expenditure would provide for better insulation and allow a person to enjoy his or her remaining years in warm comfort.

The Building Research Establishment estimates that a 25 per cent. reduction could be achieved in energy consumption and in carbon dioxide emissions. The other side of excessive energy production is excessive production of carbon dioxide and of the other toxins produced by industrial processes. One cannot blame a vehicle manufacturer if the car that we all want pollutes the atmosphere with the oil and petrol that it must use. However, one can blame him if he does not take every possible step to reduce the volume of that pollution.

There have been market barriers and Government failings in not redefining the market so that there can be greater energy efficiency, but unlike in the United States, which normally leads us in energy efficiency, unleaded petrol is cheaper in this country than leaded. We have already said that we are prepared to tax petrol logically. Perhaps we should also impose less tax on other products that are more energy-efficient.

The Association for the Conservation of Energy would like value added tax removed from energy-saving products. Perhaps that is going too far, because it is likely that VAT will be with us for ever. Nevertheless, there is some logic in that argument, and we have already made something of a breakthrough in establishing the precedent of lower duty on unleaded petrol. We have said that we will tax less those things that are less damaging.

Let us consider the other side of the question. One sad example is British Gas—I have mentioned that company before, but not because I do not like it—whose tariff structure encourages customers who use less than 25,000 therms a year to waste gas. The bulk discount for the next level is such that it is worth burning and wasting power. The bulk tariff brings the total price and the unit cost down. These days that should be culpable. It should be legally wrong to be able to say, "The more you waste, the cheaper the price." That subject is also worthy of consideration by Government.

The other side of the equation is pollution produced by that vast excess of energy. We all know about carbon dioxide and I shall not insult the intelligence of hon. Members by going on about its bad effects. We know what they are. We are scared of the greenhouse effect, although we do not know why, and we are scared of nitrous oxides. We know that something is wrong and we know about global warming—or we think that we do. Perhaps, as is the case with AIDS, after a while we shall say that it probably is not as bad as all that.

The relative contribution of greenhouse gases to global warming in the past 10 years is straightforward—carbon dioxide is 50 per cent., methane 18 per cent., CFCs from our careless aerosols 14 per cent., nitrous oxides—NOs —6 per cent. and surface ozone 12 per cent. Let us just consider the 50 per cent. Half our global warming problems are caused by carbon dioxide, most of which comes from industrial Europe, using machines that it uses to produce the wealth to afford such things as studying the greenhouse effect. We can go further, as 80 per cent. of carbon dioxide is caused by the burning of fossil fuels. It is now estimated that in United Kingdom 92 per cent. of carbon dioxide is caused by fossil fuel burning, even though most of us do not have a coal fire in the house —although we may have a log fire for show. Basically we have stopped using open coal fires and that is why the house looks so pleasant and clean, and why the fogs of my youth are no longer with us.

Fossil fuel divides into coal—with the largest share—oil and gas. Unless specific action is taken, fossil fuel consumption—we largely produce our energy from coal —and carbon dioxide emissions will rise dramatically.

My other sorrow is that every European Community country except the United Kingdom has shown willingness to commit itself to working towards a 20 per cent. carbon dioxide reduction as part of the initial global goal. An agreement was signed in 1988. It is a shame that our country is not a signatory.

My thoughts are not of great significance nationally or locally, but they are of some significance. We are a relatively little country and if every little country took a good look at how it wastes or saves energy, we could also make many people more comfortable. We should consider the by-products of energy and clean them up—the Secretary of State is keen to do that and may be talking soon about the alternative energy sources that are so dear to me.

We should reverse the cuts made in the Energy Efficiency Office and reinstate energy service schemes. We should study building regulations—although the new ones are good. We should say, "What about clean, alternative energy sources?" What about the wind? It causes no pollution—it causes damage, but the sheer power of it is wonderful. What about the waves? They can cause damage, but again the power is vast. I shall not say too much about solar power in Britain, but we should think of the power that exists around our coast. We must think about the potential for energy conservation and the need for energy efficiency.

2.18 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The hon. Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) has already described to the Minister the alliance in which we jointly conspire—that is, the all-party alternative energy group.

I congratulate my colleague on winning the slot today and commend him for raising this issue. I also commend his comments to the Minister for serious consideration because much of what he says makes sense.

The hon. Gentleman touched upon the financial aspects of energy efficiency and technology. I shall briefly mention employment and the benefits that can be gained there.

The hon. Gentleman and I went to Norway where we saw two semi-tech pilot plants at Toffteshallen. One is a multi-resonant oscillating water column. The other is a tapered channel. Each is experimental, but they are producing electricity for less than 2·5p per kWh. That is better than our best nuclear and our best fossil fuel plants. Each of the plants uses British technology. The turbines were developed at Queen's university in Belfast. Each plant is producing electricity reliably, efficiently, cleanly and cheaply.

Why do the Norwegians want to do that when they have hydro-electric power coming out of their ears? The answer is simple. They do not need electricity; what they need is employment for their skilled technicians, men and women, who will come on to the labour market after North sea gas and oil have run out. The Norwegians are planning ahead, using British technology to put together generating stations that are cheap, manageable and easy to control. They can be introduced one at a time. One does not have to wait the 20 years necessary for the completion of a nuclear power station. Wind and wave electricity-generating stations can be built for several tens of thousands of pounds. They use labour for whom employment in this country is needed. It is what I call the City and Guilds type of labour—not boffins walking around in white coats with masks on their faces but honest-to-goodness blue-collar people.

Apart from the efficiency and cost-saving that such plants represent, they would provide immediate employment for people on the Clyde, the Tyne, the Tees—from where I come—and the Mersey. The European Economic Community believes that Britain has the best wave climate in the world. That would also benefit the Third world. If we developed alternative cheaper, safer and more efficient forms of renewable energy, the Third world would be able to manage them. People there would be able to understand such forms of energy. Above all, we should provide them with something that they could afford. They could have them tomorrow, if only the political will were there.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Tony Baldry): I congratulate the chairman and vice-chairman of the all-party alternative energy group, my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) and the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), on their contributions to the debate. It is an important but large subject, and in the time available to me I shall be unable to respond to all the points that have been raised, or to deal with the subject as it ought to be dealt with. However, I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy welcomed the opportunity that was afforded to him recently to address the all-party group. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North and the hon. Member for Stockton, North that Ministers in the Department consider with great care everything that the all-party group puts forward. We are grateful to it for all the work that it does.

Energy efficiency can make a significant contribution to alleviating the problems of climate change. The Government believe that climate change could represent the greatest world challenge to sustainable development. We shall do whatever is necessary to meet that challenge. However, to act alone would be pointless. The United Kingdom alone produces about 3 per cent. of the world's carbon dioxide. So all nations must act together. A global problem requires a global solution.

The analyses of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change will help us decide on the actions that we should take, and we shall fully meet our responsibilities once the necessary actions are determined. We shall also need to consider how climate change will affect different areas of the world so that affected regions can adapt in the future. The United Kingdom is taking a lead. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced at the United Nations General Assembly last November, we are establishing a new centre for the prediction of climate change.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister also proposed that the work of the IPCC should continue in order to provide a proper scientific base for any protocols setting targets for restrictions on greenhouse emissions. Global targets have to be broken down for each country. I am sure that that is the right approach and that the Prime Minister has wide international support for that initiative.

However, international consensus is still some months off and in the meantime we would clearly be foolhardy to do nothing. Nothing is not an option. The widespread international concern about climate change is clearly felt here. The Government share that widespread concern and are fully committed to protecting the environment. Energy production is a major contributor to greenhouse gases and we have been taking positive steps to do what we can now to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases into the atmosphere. One of the obvious ways to do that is to obtain whatever contribution we can from renewable sources of energy. Direct electricity producers such as wind and tidal energy give no gaseous emissions, and biofuels, although they involve combustion, recycle the carbon dioxide so there is no net increase.

Our policy, therefore, is to stimulate the development and application of renewable energy sources wherever they have prospects of being economically competitive and environmentally acceptable. We are doing that via an extensive research, development and demonstration programme in collaboration with industry and by ensuring a legislative infrastructure which allows renewable energy sources to compete equitably in the market.

The research and development programme on which £161 million has been spent to date is identifying the markets and developing and promoting the technology where appropriate. A prime example of a project to promote renewables was a recent joint study with the North-Western electricity board, which identified a potential of 400 MW with good prospects of commercial development in the next decade or two. Our earlier success story was the use of landfill gas as a fuel, which has additional benefits, as methane is a much more potent greenhouse gas than CO_2. The technology was researched and demonstrated within departmental programmes and the first 300 commercial applications are under way with a further 30 planned or under construction.

The Electricity Act 1989 provides for a private sector market in which renewable sources of energy can compete equitably when they are fully developed. In the shorter term, however, they will need some market protection while experience is gained and a manufacturing industry built up. We have therefore also provided the non-fossil fuel obligation, which should enable renewable energy to develop during the 1990s with a premium price being paid for the electricity. Renewable energy, however, will be able to contribute on a significant scale only in the somewhat longer term and we must therefore also look to shorter-term measures.

One item that all Governments will include in any internationally agreed response strategy is promoting energy efficiency. My hon. Friend outlined the need for that. We are already doing it. Energy efficiency is worth while in the economic and in the wider environmental sense. But the community as a whole, not just the Government, has to act and the community as a whole gets the benefit. We must all take action and make an immediate impact. The consequences of our inefficiency are felt not just in environmental pollution but in the bills that we pay each quarter, as individuals and as businesses.

The economic beauty of cost-effective energy efficiency improvements is that they do not really cost anything; savings of up to 20 per cent. of energy costs can usually be realised through simple, effective measures. Some cost literally nothing. On others we get our money back through lower energy bills in about two to three years. Savings after that come free.

At the end of the day, the efficient use of energy is the responsibility of each one of us. Where the Government are directly responsible for energy costs, we are taking positive action: Government Departments are looking to save 15 per cent. of our annual £300 million energy bill within five years, which is expected to involve a doubling of investment in energy efficiency measures.

However, the Government cannot force people to use energy more efficiently. The Government can offer advice and information to consumers on which they can base their decisions on investment and energy management, but the initiative to make the savings ultimately rests with the individual. In both the economic and the environmental sense, energy need not cost the earth. It is up to all of us to ensure that it does not.

Rural Communities

2.30 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I am an urban dweller and an urban representative. However, I am aware from my travels around the country and from friends and constituents who have relatives in rural areas that rural life is not quite the comfortable picture given by the glossy magazines so beloved of city dwellers.

Over the past few years, there has been a massive population shift in England. The adult population of the shires, which contain most of the rural communities, has increased by 2·7 million since 1976, whereas that of London and the metropolitan counties has decreased by 500,000 during the same period. Yet the institutional framework of our nation remains overwhelmingly urban dominated.

That has led to the ignorance and neglect of rural problems, and has affected housing, health care, transport, jobs and poverty. Even play facilities for children are affected. The idea that the country is so much better for the children does not work when one realises that skateboards do not run on grass. A rural child's first bike can be a parental nightmare.

Villages should be vibrant communities with a variety and richness equal to those in our urban villages. They should not be pushed into single-class pieces of detached suburbia surrounded by fields. Fewer than one in 10 now have a bank, a pharmacy or a permanent library.

Progress is sometimes measured in our society by economies of scale—a concept that is the scourge of small shops, small schools and small hospitals. If we do not come to terms with changes taking place in rural areas, we will have a two-tier rural society: well-heeled, middle-aged and elderly people in holiday and retirement homes making use of urban rather than rural services, and the rural poor locked into poverty, long hours, no choice, no transport and poor housing.

On health matters, I cite the joint survey last year by the Maternity Alliance and the National Federation of Women's Institutes, which found that pregnant women in rural areas face restricted choice, hospital closures and long journeys to clinics. Two thirds of rural maternity units in England have closed since 1960, yet those units are crucial. Some 32 per cent. of births in rural areas are in GP centres or community hospitals, compared with 9 per cent. nationally. Home births in rural areas are 6 per cent., compared to 1 per cent. nationally. A report was recently issued by the National Audit Office on maternity services, on which the Public Accounts Committee—of which I have the honour to be a member—will take evidence after the Easter recess.

Women in rural areas risk long journeys during labour, with the attendant risks. Most litigation currently in process relates to births in larger hospitals, not small units or home deliveries. Local maternity units do have good safety records. However, it is the fear of litigation that is behind the idea that local units cannot cope, so putting pressure on women in rural areas to travel to larger hospitals.

It is clear that the closure of local shops, and particularly of post offices, which are little used by wealthier rural dwellers, is most likely to hit those on low incomes. Fewer than one third of the rural population use local shops, but a survey commissioned a few years ago by the Department of the Environment found that those who did were the poorest. The same survey by Brian McLaughlin and his team found that public transport networks were thinly spread. Since that time, they have been spread even thinner.

The most deprived poor in rural areas are those on low incomes who have no car. They cannot get to "competitively" priced rural supermarkets, which are not as low-cost as urban supermarkets. Nevertheless, for some, the car is so essential as a means of transport that other household essentials—I emphasise "essentials"—are forgone. I freely accept that car ownership in rural areas, even two cars, is not a luxury.

Transport problems in rural areas are so serious that they have a direct effect on health care. The McLaughlin study found that a higher proportion of the rural population had medical needs, yet compared to national equivalents they made less use of general medical services such as opticians and dentists, to name but two examples.

One in seven mothers living in rural areas do not attend baby clinics after giving birth. That must be a cause for concern, and it certainly was for those who wrote the report for the Maternity Alliance and the NFWI.

I briefly mentioned the forthcoming crisis, if there is not one already, for England's 8,500 village halls. Most of them—I think about 70 per cent.—are run as charities. Much depends on the location, but the potential for the extended use of those halls to help to create employment by using new technology and all the advances in communication, in addition to being used for committees, youth groups, playgroups, the elderly, doctors' surgeries, libraries and even post offices, is quite enormous. They are under pressure and will be snuffed out if we allow the European Community—these days, I support its general purposes—to impose VAT on charities from 1992. We have a major problem on our hands and a major threat to British rural life.

If we are serious about tackling deprivation and social isolation, which is prevalent, particularly of women in rural communities, who suffer from poor transport, we need action not only to secure and to improve existing facilities but to improve access to them by better transport. I receive enough complaints about the lack of buses in my heavily built up constituency, where the only blades of grass are in three or four public parks, but bus frequencies of more than 30 minutes are 77 per cent. in urban areas, but only 14 per cent. in rural areas. Bus frequencies of one per day or fewer are only 6 per cent. in urban areas but 62 per cent. in rural areas. We know that that causes massive problems for the millions of people who live in rural communities,

With transport—I do not put these in any order of importance because the people directly affected are aware of the importance of the problems—housing is by far the biggest problem in rural communities. I understand and share the concerns about development pressures and the environment, which must be addressed, but one in five of the population in England live in rural communities. That is millions of people and they are entitled to jobs, homes and a decent quality of life, but that is under attack because of the lack of "affordable" housing.

I well understand the changes in policy and emphasis, particularly through the Housing Corporation, but they are too slow. When I was shadow housing Minister—I took professional advice on this—I could see the sense in the geographical "rounding off" of villages and small towns with extra homes to stop sprawl. I was accused of wanting to build right across the south downs. However, as a result, I support Lord Vinson, the chair of the Rural Development Commission, who said recently that the housing needs of rural people would need, on average, only "a handful of houses in every sizeable village".

Those homes must, of course, be affordable homes.

I want to illustrate the seriousness of the housing problem with two examples of real people. I do not intend to give the real names or locations. Barry and Judy, both in their 20s, started married life a couple of years ago in the third bedroom of Judy's parents' council home. They both come from old-established families in the village. They have been on the council list and have received no offers. Barry's ancestors are listed in the county records as farmers and his great-great-grandfather was a wheelwright —there may have been more than one all those years ago.

A cottage in the next village, just two miles away, came up for sale. It was two up and two down with no bathroom, and was priced at £30,000. They could just afford it if they both kept working. They started negotiations with the estate agent, but he advised the vendor to withdraw from the offer and to increase the price to £50,000. That was the end. Barry and Judy now live in a council flat seven miles away with no hope of returning to their local community.

My second example concerns Ian, the son of a farmer. He is getting married next year and wants no future other than to remain in his rural community and to work the land. He has no hope of a rented home in the area, so he wants to build a small bungalow on his father's farm. It will not be a mansion or an executive pile in the middle of a meadow, but a small bungalow set among the other buildings on the farm. The local community agrees that it would be a sensible thing to do, but permission to build there has been refused.

I began by saying—and I do not apologise for this—that I am an urban dweller and representative. I have no ready-made solutions to what I know are serious social and economic problems in rural areas. I know that part of the reason for the political neglect is that our current electoral system discourages the political parties from campaigning equally throughout the country. No one has ever contradicted me on that. It is a fact of life that in our system, votes cast in urban and rural areas do not have equal value in the link with elected representation.

The failure of rural communities to stop the closure of small schools and hospitals and to ensure that young adults can live in the same community as their families shows that under the present system the rural voice has no clout. However well intentioned the policies emanating from the centre—where most policies emanate—the people they affect remain without influence.

Most people—including myself—do not like change, but change happens whether we like it or not and we cannot opt out, wherever we live and whatever our position in society. The closure of a rural coalfield causes change to the rural community and that change is devastating and negative, especially if the closure is unplanned. Commuters moving into villages and taking them over, sometimes to stop others joining through new development, causes change. I read of an example yesterday in the midlands. One aspect of that change has been the closure of 20 per cent. of local banks and 100 post offices a year for several years. We must attend to the consequences of such change.

No one seeks a policy for rural communities that would turn villages into living museums. Those who visit the villages, those who have friends and relatives there and those who live there do not want such a policy. We require a policy that allows local communities greater control over their own lives than hitherto. We need active balanced communities for the next century, but if shops, schools and hospitals continue to close, and jobs to disappear, and if local people are forced to move away to find a home, there is no way that the problems of rural communities can be solved. Our urban-dominated nation should and must address those problems because they affect millions of people.

I gave my debate the title "The Problems of Rural Communities". I am humble enough to admit that I do not have the solutions. I hope that I have put the problems across positively, rather than negatively, but I admit that I have referred only to the problems and not to the solutions. I invite the Minister to reflect upon them.

2.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): I congratulate the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on securing the debate and on his choice of subject. He represents an urban constituency—a very urban constituency—but he clearly has a considerable knowledge of rural issues and has thought carefully about them. I was brought up in the country and I represent a rural constituency, so I value the opportunity to debate these matters and to explain how the Government are creating a framework with the dual objective of preserving an attractive rural environment while at the same time creating a healthy rural economy.

Before I go into detail, let me put the problems of rural areas into context. At the end of his speech, the hon. Member for Perry Barr said that change was constant. I agree with that. In the past 20 years or more, we have seen huge changes in Britain as a whole. Old traditional industries such as steel, coal and shipbuilding have declined somewhat and certainly shed labour. Agriculture, too, now employs fewer people. Those industries have been replaced by others—particularly in the service sector—which have grown up and now employ more people. The age profile of the population has also changed. We have more elderly and retired people, many of whom wish to retire away from their place of work. Our attitudes to home ownership have also changed and that has led in part to increases in house prices in some areas and the consequential difficulty for people living in villages in affording local housing.

These changes are not exclusive to rural areas; they are common to the economy as a whole. Rural areas are affected by the trend and they have their share of the problems, but in some areas the problems are no greater than those in other parts of the country, and in some they are less severe. Rural areas suffer some disadvantages. The hon. Gentleman touched on some of them, including greater distances and problems of access. But they can be compensated for, perhaps, by the fact that rural areas have fewer problems of overcrowding and environmental dereliction, which are probably more acute in urban areas.

I agree that there is a considerable amount of misunderstanding about rural issues. There is no such thing as a rural idyll. That is an illusion and perhaps the result of Britain being a urban society. Surprisingly few people have first-hand experience of the countryside. People do not understand the complex social and economic forces at work. The same is true of countryside issues; people often take a simplistic view of conservation and environmental matters. I therefore welcome any opportunity to increase mutual understanding between country and town. One of the reasons why I support greater access to the countryside is that it gives city dwellers an opportunity to get out and experience the countryside, to meet people in the countryside and to improve their knowledge and understanding of it.

I want to list some of the ways in which the Government are taking a range of steps to tackle some of the problems to which the hon. Member for Perry Barr referred. We are having some success, but we are keeping the situation under review. In an evolving and changing economy, new problems arise as old ones are solved or become less acute. We are certainly not working towards a two-tier rural society with well-heeled, middle-aged and elderly people in holiday and retirement homes while the rural poor are locked into poverty and poor housing.

We are aware of the dangers of creating such a stratum in our rural areas. However, to some extent, that would be a caricature. When I was elected, many people were concerned about our villages dying. It was said that young people would move away to the more exciting towns where recreational facilities were better. Now some people are expressing the opposite fear that our villages are being overwhelmed by people moving to them after retirement or using them simply as bases from which to commute. However, that is not a realistic picture and the issues are not polarised in that way.

Newcomers to villages are often essential. If we are worried about the fact that there are not enough people to keep the local post office open or about the village shop not having enough customers or the village school not having enough pupils, we must welcome newcomers. As the hon. Member for Perry Barr said so perceptively, we do not want to create or preserve living museums in our rural areas.

The Government are aware of the problem. Our main task in rural Britain is to encourage the enterprise of those who live and work in rural areas and to increase activity by the private sector. Another task is to make the best possible use of public money—which must always be limited—in the pursuit of those aims. We also want to make full use of the opportunities to influence others to use the money to the best ends by concentrating that money in areas with the greatest need. The picture is varied and not all areas suffer from the same problems.

In general, we want to create a climate in which small businesses can flourish. The Government act through legislation or by providing pump-priming finance. To do that we have set up and are funding a range of agencies. The chief agency in England, and the best known, is the Rural Development Commission, which is sponsored by my Department. It is the main agency for diversifying the rural economy.

courseThe RDC's tasks are to highlight rural problems, to create a climate in which rural businesses and services can prosper and to initiate action to improve the economic and social development of rural areas. It achieves that by harnessing the voluntary and private sectors in the knowledge that the public sector cannot do everything on its own. Similar tasks are undertaken in Wales primarily by the Development Board for Rural Wales and the by the Welsh Development Agency. In Scotland, the Scottish Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board fulfil broadly similar functions.

Those agencies have achieved a great deal. For instance, the RDC estimates that it assisted in the creation or retention of some 3,900 job opportunities through its workshop programme in the financial year 1988-89. The Development Board for Rural Wales holds 474 factories and has sold a further 87. Together, they provide 8,500 jobs in rural Wales. Many other agencies also help to diversify the rural economy, by stimulating the flow of resources into more remote rural areas. They include the English and regional tourist boards, English Heritage, the Sports Council, the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council.

The hon. Gentleman talked with some knowledge about rural housing problems. Of course many people want, when they can, to buy rather than to rent a home. We have been very successful in giving council tenants the right to buy, and it would certainly be wrong if council tenants in rural areas were to be denied that opportunity. We are concerned to maintain the viability of rural communities. We recognise that affordable housing for local people to rent or buy has a key part to play. Our rural housing initiative, which was announced in July 1988, set out for the first time a specific policy on low-cost housing in smaller villages. Over the past two years we have introduced a series of measures to promote the provision of low-cost housing in rural areas.

We are increasing the level of investment in rural areas through housing associations, which have a major role to play in providing affordable housing both for rent and for low-cost sale, in particular through shared ownership. We have greatly increased the public funds available to the Housing Corporation, so enabling it to establish a special rural programme aimed at villages with a population of fewer than 1,000. When fully up and running, the programme should provide 1,500 homes a year for rent in small villages and 350 a year for low-cost sale.

We are introducing a scheme in some rural areas whereby housing associations can repurchase former shared ownership dwellings when the occupier moves on, thus ensuring their retention as low-cost housing. The Housing Corporation will guarantee to make the necessary funds available without reducing its rural rented or shared ownership programmes elsewhere.

Of course, public sector provision is not enough. We are also taking steps to encourage landowners and developers to help in providing affordable housing for local people. In particular, in February 1989 we announced changes to planning rules whereby local planning authorities may, in exceptional cases, release small pockets of land, not previously designated for housing, for low-cost schemes to meet local needs, subject to conditions that ensure that the houses remain available to local people.

Rural areas can also expect to benefit from the encouragement that we have given to private investment in the rented sector through deregulation and the tax incentives available under the business expansion scheme.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned health. General practitioners are the first line of health care. I remind the House that in England there are special rural practice payments for general practitioners when at least 10 per cent. of their patients in a rural area live four miles or more from the main surgery. In Scotland, there are similar provisions.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned maternity services. I understand that the clinical view is that women should be encouraged to have their babies born in hospital when possible. That must usually mean the larger and fully staffed consultant units of district general hospitals which can provide the full range of services, including those necessary in any emergency.

It is a trend of modern medicine to have larger units providing that full back-up, and hospitals of that size are inevitably located in urban areas, and it is not feasible to provide smaller community hospitals with the full range of staff and equipment. District and regional health authorities are alert to the problems experienced in rural areas, and they make provision for travelling and try to ensure that mothers living in rural areas nevertheless have proper access to such hospitals. In order to minimise the risk, provision is made so that during ante-natal care a woman who lives in an isolated area and is judged to be at risk from labour can be admitted to hospital before the expected date of confinement. I do not accept that the NHS is unresponsive to the needs of rural areas or that the standards of service that they receive are necessarily inferior to those provided in towns and cities.

We cannot expect public transport in sparsely populated rural areas to be as good as it is in towns and cities. Nevertheless, under the Transport Act 1985 we opened the way for operators to provide flexible bus services in rural areas on a commercial basis. When it is not possible to provide a service commercially, local authorities have continuing powers to subsidise such services. We have also introduced the rural transport development fund specifically to assist in the provision of rural bus services.

I am aware of some of the problems raised by the hon. Gentleman. We are not complacent about them. We are also aware that future changes will throw up new problems, and we are keeping the matter constantly under review. Our aim throughout is to protect the historic and valuable countryside that is our precious heritage, while providing excellent facilities and services for those who live and work in those areas.

Professional and Executive Emoluments

3 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Mine is the last but not least of the Easter Adjournment topics. Perhaps I have the credit of having chosen the most obscure title. Hon. Members may wonder what the title is getting at. I hasten to add that the construction of the words in the title was not my own, quite rightly according to the usual procedure and custom. I wish to raise the question of top executive salaries that top directors of companies pay themselves and the need for them to show self-restraint.

I declare an interest in several business activities outside the House, which are listed clearly in the Register. I do not need to go into them in detail and take up the time of the House. I am second to none among my colleagues in being a champion of the virtues of free enterprise, good business, business success and commercial activity. I pay tribute to the way in which the Government have encouraged that by their philosophy and been successful since 1979 in bringing about a dramatic transformaton in business practices and attitudes, and in running companies. That has stood the country in good stead and achieved for it a considerable reputation abroad.

I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment for coming to the House for the last of these Easter Adjournment debates. I hope that I have not delayed him in going to his constituency. I am grateful to him for coming from the Department to give some answers to my comments.

It is apposite that this subject should be raised from the Conservative Benches because we have a record as a business-oriented party, and the Government espouse free enterprise. I have never been so partisan in politics that I believed that trade union reform could come only from the Conservative party and business reform only from the Labour party in a divided political society. I also pay tribute to the Government for the way in which they have taken side by side the reform of trade union abuses—particularly in the earlier years of this Government—with the need for companies to put their house in order and indulge in better practices, and for stronger legislation on directors' responsibilities. All the companies legislation in recent years has created the necessary balance.

It is particularly interesting and relevant to raise this matter on the Conservative Benches because of growing anxieties about the excessive amounts that some chief executives, chairmen, managing directors and leading executives of companies pay themselves. I deliberately say "some" because of the way in which mechanisms work on company boards of directors and the generally welcome and impressive self-restraint that most directors have displayed, particularly those in charge of fixing their own emoluments.

I have noticed that, in recent years in particular, that has become a matter of great concern to the Government. I remember my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's dramatic response to complaints about the excessive remuneration—if that is a fair phrase—of, for example, the chairman of British Airways. She specifically referred to that before Christmas in a notable utterance.

In the past few years there have been an increasing number of comments in the press and in journals rather than in the House. That is one reason why I am raising the matter today. There have some references to it in the House, but only usually from the more stakhanovite Labour Members on the Bench below the Gangway.

Many recent press articles, which I shall not quote because of the lack of time, have shown the growing concern about the subject. On 1 July 1989 The Guardian had an article entitled "How Britain's bosses are taking the rise", with details of the huge pay increases of top executives, chief executives and so on, in the largest 100 companies. On 23 July 1989, a newspaper well known for its support for private enterprise and the free market, The Sunday Times, had an article entitled, "How bosses justify £534,000 a year". It compared the salaries of the 30 highest-paid executives in Britain with the performance of their companies measured by profits and the change in earnings per share.

We know that highly paid executives, to some extent with justification, justify large salaries in terms of what they describe as the international demand for their expertise, but that is often more imagined than real. I do not detect an enormous international movement of senior executives all over the world according to the exact scientific market measurement of the best emolument and remuneration.

There is a growing abuse whereby directors and chief executives give themselves large contracts of three, four or five years at the outset of their tenure of office, or when they are threatened by a takeover bid, so that if the worst comes to the worst and they are ousted, by whatever means it might be, they know that they will be protected. That produces acid comments on the shop floor among junior management executives, the public and the admittedly rather docile shareholders who seem to be the norm even in our large plcs.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) who was one of the first of our colleagues to express anxiety about the matter. He asked the Chancellor whether he agreed that British management must continue to resist excessive wage claims and ensure also that their own snouts are not too deeply in the pay trough. The Chancellor rightly replied that he would not put the second part of my hon. Friend's question in precisely that way, but he would agree with the underlying sentiment. Similar references have also been made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others.

On 19 January 1990, The Times referred to the salary of Sir Ralph Halpern, which came under fire from shareholders at the annual meeting. It referred to the fact that, once the company's profits and turnover had begun to turn down in the current recession, an additional undisclosed payment was made to Sir Ralph Halpern as the head of the Burton group, which he did not even have to reveal to shareholders. We see the difficulties that arise when shareholders assert themselves only when it is too late and the company faces a grave crisis.

We should move to a system under which such contract arrangements are established only after a chief executive, managing director, or executive chairman, has begun his or her successful remodelling or expansion of the company, rather than from day one in any given period, usually fixed—a disturbing phenomenon of modern times —through the rather phoney mechanism whereby the so-called independent sub-committee of non-executive directors on the board fix the salary of the leading executive directors. Sometimes—surprise, surprise—I then notice from the annual report that those non-executive directors have an increase in their fees.

The public are not fools and they will not be beguiled too easily into thinking that such increases are right. They compare them with the Government's fully justified exhortations to wage earners of one kind or another—including Members of Parliament—to show restraint by not making too heavy a wage claim. There is a big difference between one highly paid individual running a company with his team of directors and managers, and large numbers of the work force. The difference between the two is self-evident, but in a society that not only takes pride in the net, proven results of economic success that we hope to develop further in the future but bears some semblance still to being one nation, with fairness, balance and self-restraint by those in a position to fix their own rewards, there is a need for the Government to take a growing interest.

That is easy to say, but it is much harder in a free enterprise society and free market country to determine how the Government should involve themselves other than by exhortation. I make no apology for saying that there is no magic answer, particularly for an Administration who believe that it is not the place of Government to intervene in private matters.

The Government deliberately promote all kinds of specific and sometimes esoteric savings mechanisms and a commercial climate that encourages personal success and incentives. Above all, they have helped the higher-paid in society by reducing income tax. Those are all spectacular achievements, and the Government are entitled to ask senior executives of large companies and of publicly quoted plcs answerable to their shareholders, both institutional and private, to show self-restraint.

Earlier, I referred to the attack made on Lord King of Watnaby, who received a 116 per cent. pay rise in 1989, with the consequence that he was confronted by angry shareholders at the British Airways annual general meeting in the Barbican. It was asked whether the turnround by British Airways justified a doubling of Lord King's salary. An article in The Sunday Times of 23 July 1989 asked:

> "what sort of example does it set for the British workforce as it is being asked to accept wage increases in single figures? BA justifies the increases on the grounds that King's salary only puts him on par with his opposite numbers in American airlines".

Again, there is the conundrum of international salary comparisons, which in reality is somewhat exaggerated.

The example of self-restraint set by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is regarded by many people as being unfair on herself. She is perceived as very underpaid. She has a very modest salary by comparison with the huge incomes earned today that I could quote were sufficient time available.

What else can the Government do apart from set good examples of that kind? It is important for them to take an active role in pronouncing on such matters, even if they take no direct action in terms of imposing pay restraint, be it institutional or legislative. That would be totally alien to our philosophy as a Government, and I am not suggesting it as a solution.

However, Government utterances can be an important influence. When there are examples of huge increases of £1 million-plus for some directors of leading plcs capitalised at more than several hundred million pounds, or for directors who have run their companies into the ground but continue to receive huge payments while everyone else is suffering or being made redundant, the Government have a role to play in making their views known.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider the importance of monitoring statements, and so on, from his Department from time to time. If the Department merely exhorts wage earners to show restraint when making claims for higher pay, be it in the public or private sector, and does not pay attention to practices that create envy and jealousy among the lower-paid in society, it can unwittingly and innocently serve as an agent in the creation of an unfair society.

The lower income tax introduced by the Government means that the need for wage restraint among executives of leading public and quoted companies is even stronger. I pay tribute to the notable restraint shown by a number of chief executives, such as Lord Weinstock of GEC. Above all, it is important that the Government, the City, and others encourage shareholders not to remain docile but to be difficult and demanding.

I particularly call upon institutions in the City to show that they intend to play an active role in those matters, not only the matter of excessive pay levels manifested here and there and in quite a few other companies, but in these unwelcome contract developments which seem frequently to be a development of our commercial and industrial society.

I deliberately conclude my remarks—and once again I thank my hon. Friend for coming to answer the debate—by paying tribute to the number of exceptions which, if time had allowed, I would have mentioned in detail. I shall not do so today, for obvious reasons.

A total contrast is shown in Japan, which is the most successful economic system in the world, where 110 million people are creating a giant, highly successful, high-technology exporting economy and commercial system. It is interesting for us to consider the remuneration figures of the chief executives of Japanese companies which are successful worldwide. With a number of small exceptions, and not allowing for the separate question of perks and emoluments of a non-financial type, almost exclusively the picture is one of considerable restraint. The ratios are between six and 10 times the wages and salaries paid to management trainees on entry into those huge Japanese enterprises which export worldwide—and if we think of all those famous Japanese names, in almost all cases that is true—unlike the ratios of between 20 and 50 times that we find in this country, where chief executives pay themselves £1 million in comparison with a manager who may earn £40,000 for a senior executive post.

Although we accept the natural effect of inequalities in our society, and although we believe that it is part and parcel of what we hope will be a continuing economic success, we have to consider the other side of the coin, which is the Government's obligation to create a healthy economy and a moral economy. I hope I say that without showing any naivety or indulging in excessive wishful thinking. I think that the two can go together. We can create a fair society where the person on the shop floor feels part of the team and identifies with the chief executive and does not regard him as an overpaid prince of industrial and commercial society.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick Nicholls): I acquit my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) of having caused me any inconvenience by requiring me to be in the House today. I accept that the subject which he has chosen for debate is perhaps not debated often enough, and, even though the House is not entirely packed on this occasion, my hon. Friend knows that Adjournment debates often receive wider attention when they are printed in Hansard.

Before I turn to specifics, I should like to make some general observations. Few subjects in industrial relations generally generate more heat—and less light—than senior executives' pay. It is, unfortunately, all too easy for some commentators to act as though the factors which determine the pay of senior professional and executive staff are in some way different from those which determine the pay of all other workers. That is just not the case.

The plain—and no doubt to some unpalatable—truth is that the pay of all workers is determined ultimately by the interaction of supply and demand. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said on a number of occasions that the determination of pay levels and remuneration packages has to be a matter for the companies concerned and their employees. When arriving at those determinations—usually, although by no means always through the mechanism of collective bargaining—firms should obviously take into account four cardinal principles: affordability, or their ability to pay; the need to recruit staff; the need to retain staff; and the need to motivate staff.

For firms in the private sector, particularly those providing internationally traded goods and services, it does not make any sense to give—or to allow themselves to be forced to concede—wage and salary increases which, after taking associated productivity gains and investment needs into account, make them uncompetitive in the marketplace. To do so will spell, sooner or later, the decline and ultimately the demise of the firm. And of course that means the loss of jobs.

The second cardinal principle is the need to recruit staff, and it is the individual firm which is best placed to assess the conditions in the labour markets in which it operates. Only it, therefore, can know what type of staff it needs, in what numbers, and with what qualifications. Only it can assess what salaries it needs to provide to attract them.

Simply to recruit staff is not enough; they have to be retained, or the firm will face continual disruption as its staff turns over, as continuity and experience are lost and as the considerable costs of training and recruitment have to be incurred over and over again, with little return in terms of high quality and reliable production and service to customers. Remuneration packages—pay, hours and other conditions and benefits—are a major means of retaining staff. That is the third cardinal principle.

The fourth is the motivation of staff. In one sense, it is perhaps the most important of all. Staff who lack motivation and commitment cannot provide the basis for a successful and competitive enterprise which is capable of surmounting the challenges of the marketplace.

Remuneration levels and conditions of service, such as holiday entitlement and hours of work, can be a powerful motivating force, if used imaginatively. Those principles apply just as much to the managing director as to the process operator, the chief executive and the delivery driver.

To try to build a ring fence around the upper management and to claim thereby that they are either more or less important than any other worker simply ignores the fact that a company's success is built on everyone in it, from the top down and the bottom up. Everyone has to be recruited, retained, motivated and rewarded.

So what are the Government's views on this crucial interaction between the individual and the firm for which he or she works? As my hon. Friend anticipates and, I think, agrees, the Government believe that pay has to be a matter for those who negotiate and determine it. We saw only too starkly between 1975 and 1979 what happens when Governments attempt rigidly to control incomes. Job-destroying economic distortions are introduced; spurious productivity deals are cobbled together; and industrial relations are harmed. Above all, the policy fails to deliver the goods: the long-term rate of growth in incomes is not moderated. None of us, therefore, would wish to return to those bad old days.

Companies, however, need the best management available. In sectors where managers are internationally mobile, their remuneration needs to be competitive, at least to some extent, internationally. It is not for the Government to decide what is or is not an appropriate remuneration for key managerial jobs. The Government have never tried to defend, nor will they now, wage or salary increases that are unjustifiable, either for management or for the work force as a whole.

The justification for pay increases for chief executives and managing directors are affordability and the need to recruit and retain appropriate talent. It is a matter entirely between companies and their shareholders how that is done. No Government can judge what damage would be done to a company's prospects by the loss of key staff who were the architects of its corporate strategy.

To turn to more specific issues, I must first remark that, typically, directors' and management salaries show extremely wide variations, depending on the size of the business, its profitability and turnover. According to a recently published survey, United Kingdom managing directors' salaries range from about £30,000 a year upwards. The average chief executive's pay in the United Kingdom is £62,820 which, according to a recent survey, is considerably lower than the average in West Germany, France and Switzerland.

It is fruitless and distorting to quote but not qualify the widely known salaries of a very few key individuals as proof that, across the board, our managing directors are overpaying themselves. We rank seventh in a recently published international league table of chief executives' remuneration, when all benefits are taken into account. On these figures we should not criticise ourselves for paying, as a general rule, overly high salaries. It may be that we are actually underpaying some key players in the fight for greater business efficiency, enterprise and trading success.

It might be worth saying a word or two about non-pay benefits. They, too, are part of the remuneration package. Contrary to popular belief, the company car, medical insurance, help with the house buying, share purchase or option schemes and performance bonuses are no longer the sole preserve of the company chairman and the board member. These benefits are spreading extensively to more junior employees, to smaller companies and to many more sectors of industry and commerce, including parts of the public sector. The wider spread of those elements is attributable to their effectiveness in recruiting key staff at all levels.

We must also take into account the fact that calculating meaningful average annual increases for this particular group is difficult. Recently, three respected management consultancies came up with quite different answers to the question: by how much have directors' and managment salaries increased over the last year? One answer was 9·7 per cent., one was 11·4 per cent. and one was a massive 27·8 per cent.

I suspect that consistent, clear and accurate figures will be well-nigh impossible to obtain because of the extremely high variability within the group, and the fact that a tiny minority of very high increases will seriously distort the average figures. Be that as it may, and accepting that any figures likely to be bandied about should be treated with the greatest scepticism, we must also take into account the fact that, while some directors are highly rewarded, many of them also suffer cuts in remuneration when their businesses run into difficulty. In 1988-89, for instance, directors' total pay fell in four major companies by 18·1 per cent. 32·9 per cent. 11·1 per cent. and 21·1 per cent.

Many directors and chief executives are much more directly exposed than their work forces to fluctuations in the performance of their companies. Therefore, I agree with the remarks that my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have made in the House on a number of occasions. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East usefully drew attention to that.

Because time is short, I shall not quote any of those remarks at length, but when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was Chief Secretary to the Treasury, he said:

> "I have never justified wage or salary increases that are unjustifiable, and I do not do so now. It is not, however, for me to determine what is or is not justifiable in that respect."—[Official Report, 8 June 1989; Vol. 154, c. 352.]

It must be accepted that the right salaries are not automatically synonymous with accepting unrealistically low salaries to satisfy the complaints from some hon. Members—not my hon. Friend—who believe that anyone earning more than they do has something to answer for.

Setting a good example must involve demonstrating real leadership; high levels of commitment to the company, at times with considerable cost to family life; high levels of expertise and experience; an enterprising and vigorous approach to expansion; a willingness to embrace change; and the continuous striving for more efficient business practices. All those valuable characteristics deserve appropriate reward, but it must be up to the businesses themselves to judge what they can afford to pay their key executives.

Paying an executive less than what is needed to recruit, retain and motivate, merely to counter some of the objections that might be made by others, simply will not set a good example. In the final analysis it might set a thoroughly bad one. It is as distorting to the internal economy of a business to pay chief executives too little as to pay them too much. It might be distorting to the point of disaster if the Government were to interfere directly with those crucial decisions. By paying too little, important skills and talents will be lost. Just as much for the work force, the need to recruit and retain good management is absolutely essential for business success.

My hon. Friend and I probably agree far more than we disagree. However, I should like to mention two points. My hon. Friend mentioned the possibility of my Department conducting monitoring statements and said that it was easier to identify irresponsibility than to know how to deal with it. I have tried to give examples of some of the sources that are available to us. There is obviously a fair degree of variation, even on what commentators say. The only point that would trouble me about any formalised monitoring is that it would be difficult to know whether one was getting a comprehensive picture.

It is even more fundamental that, if one found that there had been a steady or perhaps dramatic increase in particular directors' salaries, knowing that in a formalised way would not enable my Department or any of my hon. Friends to say that those increases must have been unjustified merely because they were at such a level. It would not be possible to go so far.

I accept that that would be a more difficult argument for my hon. Friend and me than for the Opposition, who would take a more traditional and formalised attitude. It is difficult for us to debate the matters in the context of a society which my hon. Friend said should be economically and morally healty.

The problem with trying to lead by example is that those whom we expect to be impressed by our example are not impressed at all. I am sure that my hon. Friend, like me, will sometimes have been attacked at public meetings on the subject of the salaries of Members of Parliament. When I compare them with those of, for instance, civil servants or the senior chef in the Members' Dining Room, and point out that we have exercised considerable restraint over the years, my words are usually greeted with hoots of derision, the implication being that a Member of Parliament who is paid £24,000 a year is grossly overpaid. People's attitude is that, if they only had the time, they could do our job more effectively. I do not know whether that solves the conundrum, but at least it means that I can finish on a note that unites my hon. Friend and me.

I value the opportunity to consider the subject that my hon. Friend has raised and—I hope—to respond to some of his concerns.

Mr. Speaker: Before I adjourn the House, may I wish hon. Members and our officials and staff a very happy Easter recess?

It being half-past Three o'clock, MR. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Order [27 March] and the Resolution [16 March] till Wednesday 18 April.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufactured Goods (Exports)

1. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the level of exports of manufactured goods to Japan in 1989.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): The level of United Kingdom exports of manufactured goods to Japan in 1989 was £1,938 million, an increase of 29 per cent. over 1988.

Mr. Hughes: Does not that welcome answer show that the standards and quality of British manufacturing are very high? Is not that why we sell so well to countries such as Japan? Is it true that the British kitemark on British products is taken as a symbol of that quality? Would not those who are trying to export to Japan be well advised to have the kitemark on their products because people recognise it throughout the world?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right. The great growth in our exports to Japan is gratifying and, I believe, based on greatly improved British quality—which was not the case some time ago. The more that can be done to underline that quality in the way that my hon. Friend suggests, the better.

Mr. Skinner: Is not it true that Japan has a massive trade surplus with Britain, and has had for many years? The amount to which the right hon. Gentleman referred is a flea bite compared with the amount of Japan's trade with Britain. Is not it also true that the meeting of Finance Ministers last week discussed ways to try to coax Japan to take more British and American goods? Did not Japan refuse to take skis manufactured in Britain because it has a different sort of snow? Did not it refuse——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that we can start this new part of the Session with hon. Members asking single questions; otherwise it is not fair for other hon. Members who have questions on the Order Paper.

Mr. Skinner: Is not it true that Japan refused to import cosmetics from other countries because the Japanese have a different sort of skin? Did not it refuse to take oranges from the Third world because it says that Japanese stomachs are too small?

Mr. Ridley: We are on course to meet our target of doubling our exports to Japan in the three years to 1990. That is quite an achievement. We have a trade deficit with Japan, but so does practically every other nation. Of the European countries, Britain has the second highest rate of export growth.

Mr. Michael Morris: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the British leather industry would like to enjoy the 29 per cent. increase to which he referred? Is he further aware that ever since trade with Japan began, there have been artificial barriers to such exports? Will my right hon. Friend, on a personal basis, make the strongest possible representations to the EEC to ensure that those artificial barriers—which prevent the best leather in the world from being exported to Japan—are lifted?

Mr. Ridley: I agree with my hon. Friend. This is one of the areas in which the Japanese have failed to liberalise their markets, and I intend to raise the matter with them when I visit Japan in the summer. I shall make my hon. Friend's point with such force as I can command.

Mr. Gordon Brown: What impact is the policy of high interest rates having on investment and therefore on our long-term ability to export to Japan and elsewhere? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that receiverships have increased by 109 per cent. over the first quarter of 1989? What help is it to exporters to have, in addition to high interest rates, cuts in export services, cuts in research and development help for firms, and even cuts in the consultancy service that was set up only a few months ago?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must know that investment is coming into Britain from Japan at ever greater rates. That helps us to increase our exports. We are now exporting motor cars to Japan. I do not understand how interest rates affect that process. The hon. Gentleman quoted figures, which he also gave in a newspaper recently, for alleged cuts in services provided to industry by my Department. He probably does not realise that last year there was a shortfall in take-up of those services. The demand for them fell, so it was not possible to meet the budget for that year. There have been no budgetary cuts. The hon. Gentleman should do his homework before he makes silly allegations.

Mr. David Martin: On a recent visit to Japan I was impressed by the Department's initiatives, through Opportunity Japan, and by the calibre and quality of the British embassy staff, from the ambassador downwards, who were implementing that policy. I hope that during his visit my right hon. Friend will do all that he can to promote structural changes which will advance the steps that have already been taken and will make clear to British business the opportunities in Japan which did not exist as recently as a few years ago.

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, in particular for the tribute that he paid to staff in our embassy in Japan, and during my visit I shall pass on his tribute to those concerned. I agree that the Opportunity Japan campaign has been a great success. I will take every possible measure to increase that success in the time ahead.

Steel

2. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the steel industry in the United Kingdom.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I have every confidence that there is a bright future for the United Kingdom steel industry now that all of it is in the private sector and free from Government interference.

Mr. Mitchell: A declaration of confidence from the Government in their present state is more a kiss of death than an endorsement. As domestic demand for steel is likely to be depressed because of what the Government are doing to deflate the economy, will the Minister have a word with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and tell him that the only way to encourage exports and to stop capacity being closed in this country is to get the pound down to a competitive level so that industry can compete effectively in Europe?

Mr. Hogg: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman's continued contact with the non-socialist world—he is, of course, a valued and I think well-paid employee of one of Mr. Murdoch's companies—has enabled him to ask the kind of question to which I am extremely happy to respond. As the House will know, as a result of Government policy there has been a transformation in the British steel industry. In the 1970s and early 1980s, the industry made huge losses and required vast subsidies. I am glad that it is now among the most profitable and productive steel industries in the world.

Mr. Holt: Will my hon. Friend take it from one who has a steelworks in his constituency that the steel industry is doing extremely well and that one thing that would set it back would be for the Government once again to start interfering in the running of that great industry?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is entirely right. There are various ways to measure the transformation, but one way is in terms of productivity. In 1980, the United Kingdom produced 84 tonnes per man year. I am happy to say that by 1988 that had increased to 347 tonnes per man year —a staggering transformation which has made the United Kingdom steel industry among the most productive and efficient in the world.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: If there is such confidence in the steel industry, and if such a transformation has been wrought, why has Sir Robert Scholey of British Steel twice refused to meet shop stewards from the Ravenscraig and Dalziel plants in Scotland? As there is every likelihood of a £700 million profit this year in steel, will the Minister monitor the level of investment in that industry in Scotland and ensure that meetings take place between Scottish representatives and the chairman?

Mr. Hogg: There are no ifs and buts about the transformation. It is certain. Let me give the House some more figures which might also help the hon. Lady. In 1979-80 British Steel lost £1,784 million, which transferred into current terms is £3,359 million. I am happy to say that in 1988-89 British Steel made a profit of £593 million. In the first half of 1989-90, it made a profit of £423 million. The transformation is real; there are no ifs or buts about it.

Manufactured Goods (Exports)

4. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the growth in exports of manufactured goods to the European Community since 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): Exports of manufactured goods to the European Community have risen from £13 billion in 1979 to £38 billion in 1989, an increase of £25 billion.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend confirm that in the last three months for which figures are available visible exports from Britain to the European Community increased by 11 per cent., whereas imports increased by only 0·5 per cent.? If those figures are correct, do not they show that the trend is very much in the right direction?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. The trend is certainly in the right direction. The figures relate to all our visible trade with EC and non-EC countries. It is most encouraging to see the trade balance improving, as forecast by the Treasury and by a variety of external forecasters. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) did not remain to hear the rest of these questions. He has been saying that the trade balance is not improving. How wrong he is, but how right it is that the trade balance is improving, as we expected, because British industry is responding well.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Will the Minister give the figures for 1979 and 1989 of imports from other European countries to the United Kingdom and compare them with the figures that he gave earlier?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman is right that imports from the European Community have risen. As one would expect, there has been a big increase in imports and exports as we benefit from more trading patterns with Europe. Comparing the figures for 1979 and 1989, the balance is not much different. The proportion of imports from the European Community in 1989 was similar to the proportion in 1979.

Eastern Europe

5. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of his trade mission last month to Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Ridley: Together with a group of business men, I visited the Soviet Union and Poland from 10 to 17 March.

Poland is making rapid progress towards replacing socialist economic policies with a free market. There are good opportunities for British investors. In the Soviet Union, the pace of change is slower.

Mr. Field: A principal reason for my right hon. Friend's visit to Russia and Poland was to urge them to introduce a commercial and legal framework to reassure entrepreneurs and businesses that they could invest with confidence. How did he succeed on that and on currency convertibility and the ending of import licensing? Does he agree that, with only £197 million of exports to Poland last year, it is much too important a market to be left to West German business men?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right. We need a proper framework of law and rules on pricing, insolvency payments, debt collection, monopolies and subsidies controls before they can become full market trading countries. The prospects of anything transpiring are less in Russia than in Poland, which is trying as hard as possible to put in place the essential commercial infrastructure. That will help us greatly to invest, to Poland's benefit as well as to ours, and to increase trade. At the moment, the Poles have a shortage of hard currency and are unable to purchase much from the west. It will be much better when Poland has achieved convertibility. We urged it to achieve fully convertible currency at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Hood: During his mission, did the Secretary of State discuss with the Polish people the failure of the British free market capitalist system? Did he explain why we have a massive trade deficit and high interest rates and why small businesses are going bankrupt by the day? The Government have introduced the uniform business rate, which will bankrupt even more. Did the right hon. Gentleman hold that up to the Poles as an example for their future economic strategy?

Mr. Ridley: I do not know which country the hon. Gentleman is talking about. He might like to know that since 1981 manufacturing output in this country has gone up by 32 per cent.; manufacturing productivity has gone up by 51 per cent.; profits have increased by four times; and manufacturing investment has been growing at a real rate of 5·5 per cent. a year. The hon. Gentleman seems to have mixed up the two countries. Anyone would have thought that he was talking about Poland. It would be a disaster to try to apply east European methods of economic management, as they have been hitherto, to the very successful British economy. It should be the other way round.

Mr. Ward: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the Opposition for underselling this country at every opportunity? Does he agree that should the Soviet Union and the Polish nation seek help in setting up free economies on the lines of our banking and business world, we will give them every possible assistance, despite the efforts of the Opposition?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Britain is viewed everywhere—except among Opposition Members—as one of the world's most successful economic transformations. We are sufficiently well off to be able to provide a £50 million know-how fund to help the Poles to set in place the essential infrastructure to which my hon. Friend referred. At the same time, we have made generous contributions to various funds, including £15 million for agriculture, £190 million towards EEC assistance and $100 million to the stabilisation fund.

Mr. Beith: Will not the Secretary of State have to have further discussions with his counterparts in the Soviet Union if events in Lithuania move towards some kind of economic blockade? Will not he need to make it clear to his Soviet counterparts that he will facilitate any trade arrangements that may be necessary to ensure that essential supplies and commodities can be made available to the people of Lithuania?

Mr. Ridley: It is not for me to answer for foreign policy towards Lithuania. All that I can say is that we are watching the situation very carefully and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will take any action that he deems to be correct at the right time.

Trade Barriers

6. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to discuss trade barriers with Switzerland and other European Free Trade Association countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend and I will be meeting the ambassadors of Switzerland and other EFTA countries on 2 May when there will be an opportunity to discuss a range of subjects.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that since the EFTA countries trading together form the European Community's largest trading partner, the creation of a European economic space must be the main objective of the British Government's relations with EFTA?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right. Between 1972 and 1984 tariff barriers came down and from 1984 onwards, under the Luxembourg declaration, there was progress to include EFTA in a number of market-opening measures to bring our markets closer together. My hon. Friend will be glad to know that negotiations will be under way to see whether we can bring EFTA into a common European economic space with the European Community, and Britain is at the forefront of member states urging that upon our Commission and Community partners.

Mr. Batiste: Does my hon. Friend agree that although it is desirable to extend the European economic space, alongside it must be mutual obligations on a wide range of issues, including non-tariff barriers, state aids and the openness of stock markets in countries apart from the United Kingdom?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right, and some of those matters were already covered by the Luxembourg declaration. Many EFTA countries are making good progress in reducing state aids and implementing sensible economic policies. I wish that some Opposition Members would begin to learn from those economic policies. They still seem to be wedded to massive interventionism, which is illegal for a member of the European Community and which is no longer practised by many EFTA states. The Government are determined to see the European Community police those disciplines of fair trading within the Community and throughout EFTA where we have the necessary agreements so to do.

Stock Exchange

7. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the stock exchange; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Ridley: Ministers meet the chairman of the stock exchange whenever appropriate to discuss topics of mutual interest.

Mr. Doran: When the Secretary of State next meets the chairman of the stock exchange, will he discuss with him fraud and investor protection in the City? As we move towards 1992, with the present high levels of fraud and lack of investor protection in the City, is not business likely to flow from Britain rather than to come here?

Mr. Ridley: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says. The Government have put in place four specific measures to provide a strong legislative framework to regulate the activities of the City. The previous legislation was woefully inadequate. Furthermore, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has abolished stamp duty on share dealing, which will help to make London remain the centre of European financial activity, and I am confident that it will.

Mr. Hanley: Will my right hon. Friend remind the Labour party that this Government introduced a criminal offence for insider dealing and for trading in investment business without a licence? It ill-befits the Labour party to complain about our form of regulation. Will my right hon. Friend also confirm his confidence in self-regulation as a principle in the City?

Mr. Ridley: I have never understood why the Labour Government of 1974 did not proceed with the previous Government's plans to put in place legislation on insider dealing and other matters and why, during all their six-year tenure, they passed no legislation to deal with that problem. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to point to that grievous omission. I also agree with my hon. Friend's latter remarks.

Rev. Martin Smyth: While welcoming the tightening up in the City, may I ask the Secretary of State to agree that there may be a need for a revision of the guidelines for the futures and options markets for the protection of investors?

Mr. Ridley: It will be for the Securities and Investments Board to consider whether changes are needed. With the system of self-regulation that we have in place, it is for practitioners, guided by the SIB, which has authority, to decide how best to ensure that regulation is of the highest standard but at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. Charles Wardle: When my right hon. Friend next meets the chairman of the stock exchange, will he ask what lessons could have been learnt from the ombudsman's report on Barlow Clowes? Will he ask him whether the class 1 circular issued upon the reverse takeover of Barlow Clowes by James Ferguson (Holdings) plc in April 1987 should have contained more information about the trading relationship between Barlow Clowes and Barlow Clowes International?

Mr. Ridley: All that I can say is that I will draw my hon. Friend's comments and questions to the attention of the chairman of the stock exchange. It is not for me to reopen those questions, as the Financial Services Act 1986 has transferred the responsibility elsewhere.

Post Office

11. Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Post Office.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Eric Forth): I will next meet the chairman of the Post Office, Sir Bryan Nicholson, on 4 May.

Mr. Boateng: Will the Minister confirm the Government's commitment to the Royal Mail as a national public monopoly? Will he assure the House that he has not fallen prey to the predatory exercises of those who want to get their hands on the choicest cuts of the Royal Mail while leaving the ordinary consumer to the mercy of an inferior service? How much are the Government committed to the Royal Mail and to a service for all consumers?

Mr. Forth: The answer to the question is yes. We are convinced that the future of the postal service must involve a service that is universal in its coverage and operates at a standard price for all its users. We are confident that the management and employees of the Post Office are dedicated to a constant improvement in the service that they operate for the people of this country. That has the full backing of the Government.

Mr. Knapman: Does my hon. Friend agree that competition is good and monopoly is bad and that before any future European directives are issued those basic facts should be taken into account?

Mr. Forth: Yes, that is right. In this country and throughout the Community, we must try to establish that balance of universal coverage which is appropriate and necessary to provide a level of service with the maximum reasonable and available competition so as to give the maximum benefit to all our users and consumers. We are absolutely dedicated to achieving that.

Mr. Beggs: Prior to meeting the chairman of the Post Office, will the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry consult his colleagues, including his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, about the possibility of enabling constituents throughout the United Kingdom to purchase motor vehicle road fund licences from post offices, and will he then discuss that with the chairman of the Post Office?

Mr. Forth: That is as much, if not more, the responsibility of the Department of Transport and of my right hon. and hon. Friends there as it is of this Department. I am aware of the concern that the hon. Gentleman has expressed because it is something with which all hon. Members have to deal on a constituency basis. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are constantly seeking to ensure the best and most effective coverage for all parts of the kingdom. If the hon. Gentleman has a constituency case, I assure him that I and my colleagues will look most carefully at it.

Mr. Forman: Is my hon. Friend aware that his answer to the original question will be most welcome to the chairman of the Post Office and to all its employees? Will he confirm that there is a danger that the European directive on postal services could introduce barriers to new entrants to the market? Will he assure the House that it is Her Majesty's Government's policy to ensure that that does not happen?

Mr. Forth: First, I assure my hon. Friend that as yet there is no directive. A group of senior officials, including officials from my Department, are considering the possibility of publishing a Green Paper—a discussion document—to try to establish the correct place for the postal services in the single market of the European Community. That work is continuing. At the moment, we do not envisage that the Green Paper will emerge until later this year. At that point, it will have to be widely considered throughout the Community and by the Council of Ministers and even then, there will have to be a lot of consultation.

Secondly, I am aware that concern has been expressed about this matter throughout the United Kingdom. I assure everybody that the directive is at the very earliest stage. Although we agree that it is correct to identify the right place for postal services within the Community, equally it is the Government's intention to provide the maximum area of freedom of operation for those who wish to provide alternative services complementary to the postal monopoly.

Car Manufacturers

12. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will next meet the major car manufacturers; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Secretary of State and I regularly meet the major car manufacturers to discuss a variety of issues.

Mr. Clarke: When the Minister and his hon. Friend next meet the manufacturers, will they discuss Britain's huge £6·5 billion deficit in automotive products? Can the Minister offer any positive proposals to reduce that deficit and can he tell the House why such a huge deficit exists in such a crucial industry?

Mr. Hogg: It was perhaps a misfortune for the hon. Gentleman to concentrate so much on import penetration because he should know that import penetration occurred during the period of office of the last Labour Government. I will give the House the exact figures. In 1974, import penetration was 27·9 per cent., in 1979 it was 56·3 per cent., and at present it is about 57 per cent., so the process of import penetration took place under the Labour Government. Under the Conservative Government, however, there has been an extraordinary transformation in our indigenous capacity. Let us consider the past five years: in 1984 we produced about 909,000 units, in 1989 we produced 1·299 million units and by the mid-1990s we are likely to be producing about 2·2 million units.

Sir Dudley Smith: When my hon. Friend the Minister or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State mext meets the major car manufacturers, will he press upon them the need to sustain and encourage the car component industry in Britain, particularly in the west midlands? Is my hon. Friend aware that although it is not how we do things here, in some countries there would be positive discrimination in favour of such an industry?

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend has said. Fortunately, we are seeing a huge increase in Britain's motor car manufacturing capacity. Inevitably, that provides a great opportunity for the automotive component industry and I am pleased to say that the industry is taking advantage of it. Whenever there is inward investment in relation to the motor industry, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I stress the importance of United Kingdom sourcing.

Mr. Henderson: In the light of yesterday's announcement by Honda of the details of its 20 per cent. stake in Rover, at a price of £104 million, which gives the Rover division of British Aerospace a market value of more than £500 million excluding property assets and the DAF investment, will the Government still be making representations to the European Commission to the effect that the £56 million in sweeteners identified by the National Audit Office on a sale price of £150 million were none the less necessary to sell the company?

Mr. Hogg: The figures just read out rather painfully by the hon. Gentleman illustrate the value and importance of putting such companies into the private sector. One thing is plain. When Rover was sold to British Aerospace it was not worth the valuation suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The transformation of Rover is entirely consequent on the fact that it is operated productively and prosperously in the private sector.

Mr. Roger King: Will my hon. Friend take time out to meet the car manufacturers trade unions, in particular those which represent Ford workers, so that we may never again see a Dundee or Bridgend where phase 2 of the development of the Zeta engine has been deferred and transferred to German factories on the continent? Is not it a fact that the trade unions at that company still have to learn that their rhetoric during the recent Ford dispute to the effect that they had the power to stop Ford throughout Europe did more damage to them, their jobs and their futures than to anyone else?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. The plain truth is that while Ford remains committed to the United Kingdom, it has the capacity to put work elsewhere. It made the decision not to put the Zeta engine phase 2 at Bridgend partly > "because of the unreliability of supply experienced in recent years".

The Labour party must realise that if it supports industrial action or inflationary wage settlements, as it always does, that policy will be paid for in lost jobs.

Shipbuilding

15. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the shipbuilding industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The future of the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry depends on its ability to win orders in the face of international competition. The Government provide substantial support to the industry to assist its return to normal competitive conditions.

Mr. Galloway: Is the Minister aware that the cost of building a ship has doubled in the past few years, yet worldwide demand for shipbuilding is booming and shipowners are falling over themselves to place new orders? In the light of that, do the Government not regret having done in the past 10 years what the Luftwaffe failed to do and closed down the great majority of British merchant shipbuilding capacity?

Mr. Hogg: That was a foolish question, and an ignorant one. As for our shipbuilding capacity, there are now about 33,000 people in the shipbuilding industry. I am happy to say that the order books are good and the yards are not losing money. When the Labour party was in power, the industry lost vast sums of money and required huge subsidies. That is not the proper way to use economic resources.

Mr. Barry Field: Is not it a fact that my hon. Friend fought like a tiger for the retention of the shipbuilding intervention fund, thus demonstrating that he is not the British shipbuilding industry's enemy but its friend?

Mr. Hogg: I am flattered by the analogy. Some tiger! I should have said, "Some hog!" None the less, I will accept the compliment and I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is our intention, in time, to return shipbuilding to proper market conditions, but at present we thought it right that there should be a 20 per cent. ceiling on the intervention fund. We are comfortable with that figure, but our policy is to reduce the ceiling.

Ms. Quin: Is not it the case that in the world shipbuilding league, the United Kingdom is behind not only Japan and South Korea, but West Germany, Italy, Spain, Denmark, East Germany, Poland, Brazil, Finland and Yugoslavia? Given that fact, is not it tragic that the Government connived at the closure of the Sunderland yards even when there were bidders prepared to operate those yards without subsidy?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Lady always runs down British shipbuilding—[Interruption.] I always try to be nice to her. I think that she does that because she does not know the facts. I will give her one encouraging piece of information. In the first quarter of 1989—the last period for which I have an exact figure—the proportion of world orders taken up by British shipbuilding yards substantially increased. I hope that the hon. Lady will be pleased at that.

We tried for 18 months to find a buyer for the Sunderland yards, and failed. Consequently, we put in place a closure package, of which we notified the European Commission and had it accepted. That package has greatly diversified Sunderland's economy and given the town a much better economic future than it would otherwise have had.

Cot Deaths

22. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he first became aware of Dr. Barry Richardson's research into cot deaths; and what action he then took to alert the public.

Mr. Forth: The Department of Health wrote to my Department about Dr. Barry Richardson's research on 7 June 1989. A copy of Dr. Richardson's report dated June 1989 was received on 12 June. As a direct result the laboratory of the Government chemist was asked to undertake a scientific assessment of this research work.

In a written reply on 9 March, my hon. Friend the Minister for Health stated that a group of independent experts had been asked to investigate further claims by Dr. Richardson about emission of toxic gases from soiled mattresses, taking account of the assessment still being carried out by the laboratory of the Government chemist.

I shall await the findings of the expert working group to see if there are any implications for the use of fire resistant treatments in the manufacture of nursery furniture.

Mr. McFall: The Minister will know that the independent scientist, Barry Richardson, to whom he referred, tested 45 mattresses on which babies had died. All the mattresses were fireproofed and gave off potentially lethal doses of poisonous gases. In the light of that, why did the Minister force through legislation on fire retardent material without conducting tests? Why was no warning given to parents of the risk, however small? Is that not an indication of the Government's laxity with regard to such measures?

Mr. Forth: One of the problems in relation to this difficult subject is shown by the fact that one of the hon. Gentleman's parliamentary colleagues came to argue exactly the opposite case with me when I had to make that difficult decision. On the basis of the information known to us then, we maintained our views about fire resistance for nursery furniture. I am awaiting the findings of the work being carried out both by the laboratory of the Government chemist and by the expert working group set up precisely to examine Dr. Richardson's claims.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that it would be wrong of the Government to determine their policy on the basis of one person's findings, no matter how skilled or expert that person may be or how strongly he holds his views. Suffice it to say that both my Department and the Department of Health are looking into the matter carefully and responsibly, but with as much speed as possible and based on their findings we shall decide whether policy should be changed.

Sir Dudley Smith: I appreciate the problems, but is my hon. Friend aware that this man's evidence is very convincing and has been brought to my attention by constituents who are involved in the trade? In those circumstances, will my hon. Friend do everything to hurry up the research because, as he well knows, young lives are at stake every day?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend has made repeated representations to me on behalf of his constituent who shares the concern expressed by Dr. Richardson. I hope that he will accept that at this stage it would be best for all of us to wait until we have the findings of the laboratory of the Government chemist and of the expert working group that we have set up. Then we shall determine whether policy shall be changed. As a result of my hon. Friend's representations and others that I have received, we are more than prepared to change policy in this matter if it is determined that we should do so on the basis of the evidence of the further work that is being done. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall not allow that work to be unduly delayed.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Is the Minister aware that there is almost no remaining doubt that there is an association, found by Dr. Richardson and his team, between cot death syndrome and the gases produced by the fungal infection of mattresses? Why has he delayed an investigation into the findings for two years? The chief medical officer put out a press statement on 9 March stating that he had been "advised that no case of cot death in this country had been reported due to these gases".

Why did not the chief medical officer seek such information? That is why the information was not provided. Moreover, the expert working party has met only once. This is not urgency—it is complacency.

Mr. Forth: I wish in some ways that I could share the hon. Gentleman's certainty. Faced with these difficult policy choices and with serious matters which cause great concern to many people, I believe that we are taking a responsible and measured view and responding in that way.

Dr. Richardson met the chief medical officer at the Department of Health, so there was no lack of a hearing for him on these matters. I can only repeat that I believe that the way in which we have responded to these submissions by an individual, however expert and concerned he may be, is the right way and that we cannot determine Government policy in these important areas on the basis of the views of one person, no matter how important he may be.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Watson. Question 23.

Mr. Favell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It arises out of the last question——

Mr. Speaker: If it does, it cannot be a point of order.

Mr. Favell: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that the reason why so many Opposition Members have not turned up to ask their questions——

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order for me. I call Mr. Watson.

Mr. Favell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Watson. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Frank Field. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Tony Lloyd. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Home Robertson. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Ronnie Campbell. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Rowlands. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."]

Mr. Favell: I wish to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that questions have been asked by Opposition Members according to their surnames. If the name is McCartney or McFall, the Member is interested in cot deaths. If the name is Mahon or McKay——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me. It is a point that he is consciously making across the Chamber. I call Mr. Snape. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Fisher. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Eadie. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."]

EC Trade and Industry Ministers

32. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will next meet his counterparts in the European Commission; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Redwood: I am surprised that an Opposition Member has turned up to ask a question. I hold regular meetings with my counterparts in the European Commission on a broad range of issues.

Mr. Cunliffe: If and when the Secretary of State meets the European Commission, will he convey to it the impoverished state of the north-western region and the fact that it is imperative that the region should get more money from European grant sources to help clear up the industrial obsolescence, bad housing and bad environment caused by 10 years of neglect by the Conservative Government?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman has obviously been trying to find a question to ask because he has asked one in which he is not interested. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is here and has heard the hon. Gentleman's remarks. My right hon. Friend will speak for the whole country when he speaks to the European Commission and the other member states. We shall ensure that we get our fair share of grants and assistance from the European Community, but we are also interested in sensible budget discipline because the best way to make people prosperous is to deregulate and to get out of their way—not to take their money away from them and then give it back with a deduction for handling charges.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: How dare the hon. Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) so cry down the north-west? Is my hon. Friend aware that the north-west is improving in terms of prosperity, that its employment rate is improving with every week that passes and that it does not assist our case when Labour Members constantly cry us down?

Mr. Redwood: I am delighted that my hon. Friend has made that powerful intervention. Many Members from the north-west are rightly proud of the achievements of the north-western economy. As I travel through the country I notice how much investment, employment and opportunities are growing in the regions—more so now than in the south-east where the slow-down is more marked than in the regional economies. We welcome that surge in prosperity and believe that it is the direct result of the policies being pursued to allow enterprise to triumph and inward investment to stimulate the industrial base.

Mr. Pike: When the Secretary of State has discussions in Europe, will he consider why there is longer-term investment in industry in Germany than there is here? There is still a lack of industrial investment in the north-west. Would not we do better if we followed the German example and our financial institutions made longer-term investments in our manufacturing industry?

Mr. Redwood: There is much good long-term investment going on in this country today if only the hon. Gentleman would use his eyes and see what is happening. British industry would rightly resent his idea that it is not interested in long-term investment. I see many factories going up, many new projects, and a rebuilding of the motor car industry. That is all too obvious to those who look at the figures and travel throughout the country. Real manufacturing investment is up by a third over the past five years. I welcome that and I am grateful for it. It shows that the enterprise policies are working.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: When negotiating with his counterparts a reduction in tariffs to be carried out by the Commission through the general agreement on tariffs and trade, will my hon. Friend draw attention to the position of Turkey vis-a-vis Europe? It is the largest importer of textile goods into the European Community and although we allow goods in tariff-free it has effective import barriers of 200 per cent. to our exports there. Although it has reduced its tariffs nominally, its special tariffs—for example, for contributions to its housing funds—remain in place and constitute an effective barrier against British exports.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that important question and I shall draw its substance to the attention of my noble Friend the Minister for Trade. It is a matter of concern if liberalisation does not progress on both sides and it is an aim of EC policy to see that barriers are removed against Turkish exports as and when Turkey reduces its barriers to our exports to that country. My hon. Friend can rest assured that my noble Friend will continue to make strong representations about any unfair obstacles to trade imposed by Turkey.

House of Fraser

33. Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what latest representations he has had on his inspectors' report on the takeover of the House of Fraser; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a large number of representations from hon. Members and direct from the public expressing a variety of views.

Mr. Nellist: How is it that crooks and charlatans can get away with things like that takeover while millions of ordinary, decent families in Britain are about to be pushed into a position of illegality because of their inability to pay the poll tax? Why cannot the Secretary of State, with his hands-off laissez-faire attitude towards the Fayed brothers, be transferred back to the Department of the Environment so that he can take the same attitude to the millions of families who cannot pay the poll tax?

Mr. Redwood: The Law Officers and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have looked carefully into the case and a full statement has been made to the House about it. I have nothing further to add.

Mr. Dickens: Is not it a fact that legislation has now been introduced which will prohibit the same sort of thing happening again? But is it not also a fact that inspectors from the Department of Trade and Industry were appointed under a certain section under which it was not a criminal offence to tell untruths, whereas if they had been appointed under a different section, criminal action could have been taken?

Mr. Redwood: I do not think that my hon. Friend is right. He is right in the first part of his question in saying that the Government have recently changed the law to ensure that it is an offence knowingly to mislead the competition authorities, but on his second point I do not think that the issue was whether it was or was not an offence under a particular section.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Department of Trade undertake to study the remarkable Channel 4 programme on Good Friday evening by John Plender—in particular, the position of Kleinwort Benson and John MacArthur—and consider the whole question of truthfulness at the highest level of commerce? Is lying now all right at that level?

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has heard the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I have nothing to add to the statement that he made to the House on the conduct of the case.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that the very brevity of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's statement last month on the report of the inspectors of the Department of Trade and Industry on the House of Fraser takeover encourages the likes of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) to make wild allegations? Would not it be far better to give the subject a thorough airing in a full debate in the House?

Mr. Redwood: There will be another opportunity to discuss the matter when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gives evidence to the Select Committee. Indeed, he has already done so. In addition, a statement was made which covered all the main issues that were relevant to my right hon. Friend and the conduct of his Department.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mr. Radice. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. McAvoy. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Jack. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Ms. Short. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Ingram. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Steinberg. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Livsey. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Maxton. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not here."] Mr. Alex Carlile.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose——

Hon. Members: Hooray!

Information Technology

42. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to encourage investment in information technology for the benefit of industry.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I fancy that the hon. and learned Gentleman and I are a bit surprised to be where we are.

My Department is already encouraging the more widespread uptake and use of information technology in industry through programmes aimed at industry on the more effective use of information systems, technology transfer on open systems and advanced information technology and other related programmes. Investment by industry in information technology in hardware, software, systems and training would consequently follow as appropriate.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply, but what steps do the Government propose to take to ensure that the full range of information technology equipment is available to small businesses in rural areas which are attractive to those who can run businesses on the basis of information technology?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. and learned Gentleman requires a full and considered reply to such a full and considered question. That being so, I propose to write to him.

Mr. David Shaw: Does my hon. Friend agree that the information technology industry has greatly expanded under the present Government, whereas it was virtually at a standstill under the Labour Administration? Does he agree also that a full statement about the industry ought to be made? Will he consider publishing at the earliest possible opportunity a statement on the way in which the information technology industry has expanded?

Mr. Hogg: It is a subject which should be generally amplified and expanded upon, but as you, Mr. Speaker, will be aware, statements are not a matter for me. I therefore cannot give my hon. Friend a commitment in the terms that he seeks.

Securities and Investments Board

43. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board; and what will be discussed.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board to discuss a range of topics concerning the regulation of financial services as frequently as is necessary. No date has been fixed for the next such meeting.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does the Minister agree that now is an appropriate time to discuss with the SIB chairman whether the safeguards provided for small investors are even half-way adequate? It is clear that in this country it is all right to mislead or to reinterpret financial rules so long as one does it in terms of millions of pounds.

Mr. Redwood: I do not believe that the hon. Lady's question draws the right inference, but she is right in saying that now is a good time to discuss with the chairman of the SIB matters relating to small investors and their protection. I hope to arrange a meeting with the chairman soon for that purpose.

Gun Components (Iraq)

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on export controls in relation to Iraq.

On Tuesday 10 April, Customs officers at Teesport detained eight large steel tubes destined for Iraq, which they considered might require an export licence under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989. Subsequently, Customs obtained related documents from firms believed to be involved. Experts from the Ministry of Defence later inspected the tubes and documents and advised that all the indications were that the tubes were components of a large-calibre armament, albeit of a scale outside anything previously experienced. The tubes were therefore seized, and Customs are making inquiries to see if any individuals or firms within the United Kingdom have committed customs offences.

The House will want to know that, in the summer of 1988, the DTI was approached by two of the companies now known to be connected with the manufacture of those components. In June 1988, Walter Somers asked if licences were needed for the export of metal tubes to Space Research Corporation in Belgium. In July, Sheffield Forgemasters asked if licences were needed for the export of tubes to Iraq for use in the polymerisation of polyethylene, and in August, Walter Somers made a further inquiry related to that contract.

On the information available at that time, it was decided that the export licences were not needed for those goods. Until a few days ago, my Department had no knowledge that the goods were designed to form part of a gun. If my Department had known that purpose, then it would of course have advised that licences were necessary, and they would not have been granted.

The Government recently became aware in general terms of an Iraqi project to develop a long-range gun based on designs developed by the late Dr. Gerald Bull. The goods that were seized at Teesport, and related documents, are consistent with what is known of Dr. Bull's design. Subsequent to the seizure, the Government have also received information about further aspects of the gun's development. The Government are entirely satisfied that the tubes form part of a gun and that the Customs' action was correct.

I would like to congratulate Customs on last week stopping the export of those parts of the gun. I understand that it will not be possible to build a complete, full-sized gun from parts that have been supplied from the United Kingdom. I hope that the House will understand that, while Customs' inquiries are continuing into possible criminal offences, it is not possible to go further into the details of this case.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I hope that the Secretary of State will begin by not just congratulating Customs and Excise staff but making a full apology to them. They have been subjected to a week of hostile briefings, critical leaks, off-the-record criticism, and an attempt by the Secretary of State's own Department to walk away from its proper responsibilities for what has gone wrong. Will the Secretary of State confirm that 44 pipes have already been shipped to Iraq, and that they are part of a major armament being constructed by the Iraqi Government, that is, in his own words,

Will he confirm that the military equipment may be used for hostile purposes, and so should never have been allowed to leave this country? Will he futher confirm that, since 1988, his Department has had access to the specifications and the drawings, could have had access to the contract governing the export order and at any time has had the powers to investigate it in full?

Will the Secretary of State explain why his Department took no action during the months when it had access to the specifications and the contract? Will he confirm that his Department took no action, even when it was known in June 1988—as he has confirmed today—that the Space Research Corporation of Dr. Gerald Bull—known not for its petrochemical expertise but for its military interests—was involved, but told the companies that no export licence even needed to be investigated? Will he confirm that he took no action even when Walter Somers told his Department that it had evidence of the aiming and positioning of the devices being ordered for Iraq?

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, even if his Department had made a mistake and judged that a licence was needed for military equipment, section IL 1142 in the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1987 could have required a licence for pipes for petrochemical use, and that a meeting should have taken place on that matter between his Department, the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office?

Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why his Department said nothing for an entire week, even after Customs and Excise seized the goods? Will he tell us who was briefing the media that it was merely a petrochemical order? Is it not the case that the Government have been deceived and duped on a grand scale, and that, but for the intervention of Customs and Excise staff, serious military consequences could have resulted? Will he confirm that it is not enough to admit that a mistake has been made, and that he should also accept responsibility for it? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm, finally, that it is clear that, through slackness and complacency of almost criminal dimensions, the Government allowed through an order that could have made it possible for Iraq to acquire a weapon that he has himself described as and whose use could affect regional and even world stability? Which Department will accept the responsibility?

Will the right hon. Gentleman now announce that he will set up an independent inquiry to establish the degree of culpability, and tell the House what the Government's commitment is to the arms embargo with Iraq? Finally, will he tell the House what immediate changes he has ordered in export controls so that this deeply embarrassing and sorry episode, which has made the British Government the object of ridicule, will never be repeated?

Mr. Ridley: To coin a phrase, that was going over the top on a scale outside anything previously experienced. I seriously counsel the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) not to believe every word that he reads in the press. I can tell him straight that the Customs personnel have released no confidential information to the media. They have fully respected the confidentiality of material that they have obtained during their inquiries. There has been no statement until now, and, in the light of the fact that Customs and Excise is considering taking out prosecutions, I cannot answer detailed questions without prejudicing the rights of people who may be on trial. It would be wrong to pre-empt any such trial by what I should say in the House.

The hon. Gentleman seems to suggest that the gun has been exported, that it is a fait accompli. I emphasise that the gun cannot be in operation without all its parts, and it is a great success on behalf of this country to have prevented that. The hon. Gentleman should be paying tribute and congratulating the Customs and Excise on having frustrated this unpleasant export.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Walter Somers is a long established and highly respected firm in Halesowen in my constituency? My understanding is that it has always acted in the closest co-operation with his Department. I do not agree with the absurd charges made by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). I am somewhat concerned to safeguard the good name of that excellent company and the jobs of its workers, yet when I sought reassurance from his Department and another Department, the replies were rather in the style of the television series, "Yes Minister". Surely this difficult matter should be cleared up as soon as possible; otherwise, many good men in the midlands will be deeply upset.

Mr. Ridley: I am aware of my hon. Friend's interest in that firm. However, it would be wrong to comment on the coctacts between my Department and the firm, for the reason that I have given twice already—that I must say nothing that would prejudice the possibility of criminal proceedings at a later stage.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): Should the Secretary of State not only give the Customs and Excise department thanks, but apologise for the press briefings that were given throughout the week saying that it had got it wrong? Could he enlighten the House by explaining exactly what is polymerisation of polyethylene —[Laughter.] The reason I ask that is that the wider issue is why the Government are allowing the export of high technology of any sort to a regime that engages in chemical warfare.

Mr. Ridley: No apologies are needed. I have answered the question about what the Customs and Excise department has said and done, and the right hon. Gentleman should accept that. However, he does not have to accept every word that he reads in the press. The polymerisation of polyethylene is, I understand, a chemical process that takes place in petrochemical activities under very high pressures. It is possible to export material for petrochemical works freely, and no export licence is required.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Is not the alertness of Customs and Excise officials in interrupting this sinister shipment a matter for warm congratulation? My right hon. Friend has my full support in that. Does he accept that Iraq may have already used chemical long-range delivery weapons, and that it recently threatened to do so again against Israel? Will he reassure us that nothing will be done to appease the immensely dangerous ambitions of that ugly regime and its dictator?

Mr. Ridley: Nobody could condone the plans that it is thought Iraq has in that area. On the other hand, it is quite right strictly to control the export of armament materials. If we are aware that that is happening, we will, of course, refuse a licence.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Secretary of State ask either the Secretary of State for Defence or the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark) a factual question? On what date did the Ministry of Defence or its Procurement Executive first know that there was something that could be said to be in the nature of a weapon? When did the Ministry of Defence first know that there was a problem? On what date did that occur?

Mr. Ridley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will have heard the question that the hon. Gentleman put. I think that it would be better for him to reply for himself.

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove) rose——

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know either, and it is not a matter for me.

Sir Hal Miller: Since, more than two years ago, I made an offer to his Department, to the Ministry of Defence and, I believe, to a third agency, on behalf of Walter Somers, to withdraw from the contract, to meet the contract and to enable it to be traced, or to carry on with the contract, and as I repeated that offer 12 months later, does my right hon. Friend share my surprise that there can be any question of prosecuting the company for any contravention of regulations or lack of good faith in the matter?

Mr. Ridley rose——

Hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State.

Mr. Ridley: If any company believes that it is exporting or has an order to export any piece of equipment which might have a military application, it is for it to apply for an export licence, and in that case it is considered. Concerning the question that my hon. Friend has asked, I think that it would be wrong for me to answer the last part, since that could prejudice any possible decision.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): In view of the comment of his hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller), when those approaches were made by the firm, did the right hon. Gentleman's Department make any approaches to the Ministry of Defence? If so, on what date did they make those approaches? If they failed to do so, why on earth did they so fail?

Mr. Ridley: As I said, I cannot go into those matters at this stage.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): While I endorse my right hon. Friend's comments about the efficiency of the Customs in this case, could he say whether there is any track record by the Space Research Corporation of equipment which did not have a military use?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, sir. Space Research Corporation was involved in many types of project, many of a civil nature.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Does the Secretary of State accept that at some time the House will have to know whether or not the Defence Export Services Organisation or International Military Services, which are both 100 per cent. controlled by the British Ministry of Defence, were ever involved or approached regarding those contracts? Does he appreciate that this country is the world's second largest arms supplier? That being so and being common knowledge, it is bound to be the case that every riff-raff country around the world that is looking for weapons of destruction—sometimes to use against its own people—will come knocking at British doors. Therefore, extra vigilance has to be maintained, and that has clearly been lacking.

Mr. Ridley: That is not quite right. Extra vigilance has been exercised in the Customs operation for some time, and it has been a great success, not long after a previous success was achieved with the nuclear trigger devices, which the House will remember. I do not know why the House is accusing the authorities of not succeeding in that respect. On both occasions, success has been achieved.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Is my right hon. Friend satisfied with the co-ordination standards between Customs and Excise and his Department? Secondly, while I have no truck whatsoever with the horrendous regime in Iraq, what evidence does he have in his Department from those engaged in oil refinery design that the material and the tubes in question are not for the application intended? Thirdly, what information has he, metallurgically, to show that the tubes would be able to sustain the firing of a shell or a missile?

Mr. Ridley: On my hon. Friend's first point, yes, I am satisfied that contact between my Department and the Customs and Excise is of a high order. Secondly, as I said in my statement, from examination of the parts which have been seized at Teesport, Ministry of Defence experts have come to the firm belief and strong conclusion that those are parts of a gun. They do not believe that they were intended for any other purpose.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Secretary of State appeared to be implying that there is guilt on the part of some or all of the companies involved. If, after appropriate investigation, he finds that they are completely innocent and that the fault lies with public Departments, will he return to the House to make that clear?

What happens if other countries that may be within the targeting arrangements of this odious regime decide that they should have enormous guns? Will it be all right for Sheffield Forgemasters to go on making these tubes?

Mr. Ridley: On the first point, I do not believe that "guilt" is the right word. That would be prejudicing any trial that might take place. It is correct to allow Customs to consider whether it wants to take proceedings, and all these points would come out in any proceedings that might be taken. After the proceedings have concluded, it will be right for the House to find out the further details that it may wish to know, but I cannot prejudge Customs' decision on whether to take proceedings.

On the second point, any firm that receives an inquiry or order to make parts that it believes could be part of an offensive weapon must apply for an export licence. If it is confirmed that it is a gun of this type, that licence will not be granted. We can be quite certain that nothing will come from this country.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows that we have an important debate to follow.

Mr. Skinner: This is important.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Skinner: This man has been protected.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Sit down, please. We have a very important debate today and a ten-minute rule Bill. I shall allow three more questions from each side. [Interruption.]

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Since my right hon. Friend is also responsible for the Export Credits Guarantee Department, will he tell us whether this contract was underwritten by the Export Credits Guarantee Department, and what are the implications of any such underwriting for the present situation in which supply has been discontinued by order of Customs?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot answer my hon. Friend's question without notice. I shall give him a full answer, but I understand that the company was paid when the goods left its works.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): In view of the bloodstained criminal nature of the regime in Iraq, which started the Gulf war and used chemical weapons, is the Secretary of State aware that far more will have to be done by Ministers to answer the question asked by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller)? While Customs officers are certain to be congratulated, Ministers are not. We shall certainly want a further statement, including one from the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Ridley: I do not think that there is anything that I can add in answer to that.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Sheffield Forgemasters acted in good faith throughout this affair? Was not it a wholly owned subsidiary of British Steel, which was wholly owned by the Department of Trade and Industry when the order was placed?

Mr. Ridley: Those facts could be verified, but I cannot myself verify them. It does not seem to be relevant to the fact that, on this occasion, the export of a piece of an armament that could have been of grave disadvantage was successfully apprehended and prevented from being used.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Why has it taken the Secretary of State's Department a full week to respond to information that was given to the country by Customs and Excise? In an earlier statement, the right hon. Gentleman informed the House that he had to have information before he could act. Will he confirm or deny that that information came from the Israeli secret service?

Mr. Ridley: The goods were distrained by Customs officers, who then waited for the Ministry of Defence to inspect and verify the purpose of the goods. There was no role for my Department to play during that period, because the goods had been distrained. There was no question of the goods being exported so long as they remained with Customs officers. If the MOD experts had reached a different conclusion, the goods would and could have been exported. The fact that the goods were prevented from being exported is a great success. I cannot of course answer the hon. Gentleman's second point, and I do not believe that he expected me to do so.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Would my right hon. Friend please remind the Opposition, in the middle of their hysteria, that Iraq has just finished a long and bloody war in which hundreds and thousands of its people were killed, that peace has not yet been signed, borders have not yet been agreed and prisoners have not yet been exchanged? Should we be surprised that a country whose next-door neighbour is larger and gripped by destabilising fundamentalism should use every form of extreme subterfuge to try to bypass an arms embargo?

As that is the case in this incident, and as we are not the totalitarian regime that the Opposition would have us become, but a free market economy, is it not understandable that it will take time to pick up such exotic undertakings in which state Governments try deliberately to bamboozle other nations? Therefore, should not companies in Britain that have acted in good faith be free from any form of prosecution and the Customs department be congratulated on its good work in picking up this particular incident?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): How much was the hon. Gentleman paid?

Mr. Ridley: There is a lot in what my hon. Friend said at the beginning of his remarks with which I agree. However, it is absolutely essential that we recognise that this has been a successful operation which has prevented the export of goods which could have had an immense potential for damage.

Mr. Page: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Secretary of State accept congratulations on behalf of the Customs and Excise for standing up to his Department's efforts to undermine the Customs and Excise department's activities in that case? Will he confirm that the British Overseas Trade Board's export intelligence promoted the project in consultation with the British embassy in Baghdad? Will he confirm that it has Export Credits Guarantee Department cover? Will he also confirm that executives at Sheffield Foregemasters met representatives of the Belgian company, which is not, as the Secretary of State tried to claim, noted for its connection with peaceful activities?

At the end of this sorry affair, does not the Secretary of State think that it has something to do with ministerial responsibility? Have not his Department and his office lamentably failed over years to seek out the military aspects of the contract? If the Secretary of State was a decent, honourable Minister obeying the usual rules, would not he resign?

Mr. Ridley: I most strongly rebut any suggestion that the DTI has not co-operated fully with the Ministry of Defence and the Customs. They worked together throughout the period to identify the equipment. A lot of what the hon. Gentleman said in the middle of his remarks was not something that I can comment on with the possibility of a case pending—[HON. MEMBERS: "What case?"] I said "the possibility of a case". With regard to the last part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, I will pass on to my noble Friend, Lord Caithness, who is responsible for the Customs, the congratulations that the hon. Gentleman offered.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on an action that has helped peace in the middle east and which will be widely welcomed by everyone concerned about the stability of that troubled part of the world? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the contract underlines the danger of trading with Iraq? May we have an assurance that all future contracts will be looked at with particular vigilance by my right hon. Friend's Department?

Mr. Ridley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I agree with what he has said. I confirm that we will continue our high state of vigilance in deciding whether export licences should be granted. I can now also tell my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that no ECGD cover was available for the contract.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Does the Secretary of State accept that, even by his own standards, this has been a truly extraordinary performance at the Dispatch Box this afternoon? Even if it means leaning across to his colleague from the Foreign Office, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the reason that 44 of those pipes are now in Iraq and that only the last batch was stopped is that the information was given to the Government by Mossad, the Israeli secret service, immediately before the goods were exported—the same Mossad that fired five bullets into the back of the head of Dr. Bull in Belgium some weeks before? Will the Secretary of State and the Government support Senator Dole's plea in the middle east last week that all countries of the middle east with a capacity of weapons for mass destruction, including Israel with its nuclear weapons, should abandon such weapons and bring about the stability that the area needs?

Mr. Ridley: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman fully estimates the gravity of this incident. Many Opposition Members try to make party politics out of a great success story in getting this export stopped so that the gun cannot be put together. Of course I shall not follow the James Bond musings at the end of the hon. Gentleman's question.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take points of order in a moment, after the Standing Order No. 20 application.

UDR Soldiers (Murder)

4.1 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the massacre by the IRA of four Ulster Defence Regiment soldiers in Downpatrick on 9 April."

During the recess, the IRA carried out a bloody massacre of four young Ulster Defence Regiment soldiers in Downpatrick on 9 April. Those young soldiers were Private Michael Adams, aged 23, who had served in the regiment for seven months and was formerly with the Royal Engineers; Lance-corporal John Bradley, aged 25, who had four years of service in the UDR and was formerly with the Royal Highlanders; Private Steven Smart, aged 23, who had served with the regiment for a period and was also with the Royal Artillery; and Private John Burch, aged 28, who joined the regiment over one year ago.

I understand from personal knowledge that three of the four bodies were so shattered that the loved ones were not able to open the coffins and see the remains. The vast crater, like a lake, that was left in the road speaks volumes about the strength of the explosives that were used to carry out those atrocious, cold-blooded murders. We should add to that the circumstances of the kith and kin—one already a mother and carrying yet another child who will never see his father; one a fiancée for whom this is a double sorrow, for her father was murdered by the IRA in the Kingsmill massacre; another a mother of two; and another a young bride-to-be, looking forward to her marriage day.

A vehicle used in the atrocity was hijacked by the IRA on the border, and no doubt the murderers are now across the border, in the very safe haven of the Irish Republic.

Those murders took place against the background of a vicious political attack on the Ulster Defence Regiment. Mr. Haughey has said that the regiment must go; Mr. Collins has said that there is no place for the regiment in the Ulster security effort; and in a recent programme, the BBC equated the Ulster Defence Regiment with the IRA and said that it was part of the problem.

One final word——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his three minutes.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I deplore the fact that the Secretary of State did not come to the House today to make a statement so that the representatives of Northern Ireland could discuss the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the murder of four UDR soldiers by the IRA last week."

As the hon. Gentleman knows, under Standing Order No. 20, I have to announce my decision without giving my reasons to the House. I have listened with deep concern to what the hon. Gentleman has said about this matter. As he also knows, the decision that I have to take is whether to give that matter precedence over the business set down for today or for tomorrow. In this case, I regret that the matter that he has raised does not meet the requirements of the Standing Order and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

4.7 pm

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take Mr. Heffer first.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): During his statement, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said several times that he could not answer the points raised by hon. Members because there could be, there might be or there may possibly be a case pending before the courts. Is that a new doctrine in the House? I have always understood that, when a case was before a court, we did not have the opportunity or the right to question Ministers on that matter, because the issue was before a court and comments here could prejudice that case.

I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, but I have never before heard a Minister make a statement and say, "I cannot answer the hon. Member"—who had raised a perfectly legitimate question that the Minister should answer—"because there could be, there might be or there may possibly be a case before the courts." Is that a new doctrine, Mr. Speaker? Is that allowed in the House? Is it not time that Ministers should be told that, when there is not a case before the courts, hon. Members who ask questions have a right to be given answers to those questions?

Mr. Speaker: In the first place, I am in no way responsible for answers that are given. Secondly, on the question about doctrine, it is not a doctrine upon which I can make a judgment. I understood that it was the judgment of the Secretary of State himself that, if he was to answer certain questions, that might be prejudicial. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): During the recent question to my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Trade and Industry from my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page), like several of my hon. Friends, I distinctly heard the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) ask from a sedentary position what my hon. Friend was being paid for his question. Did you hear that, Mr. Speaker? If you did, do you agree that the hon. Member for Walsall, North should apologise to the House and withdraw what he said?

Mr. Speaker: It was a highly charged Question Time. I did not hear—[Interruption.] Order. There was a good deal of noise and I did not hear everthing that was said from a sedentary position.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask you to reflect on two points that arise from the statement made by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. First, while you are right in saying that you have no responsibility for the content of the answers given by the Secretary of State, if the phrase "I have nothing to add" goes unchallenged, through you and the Table Office, it becomes a blocking motion whereby further written questions may not be tabled.

The second and shorter point that I ask you to consider, Mr. Speaker, is that only five hon. Members were still standing at the end of the statement and many of us were also seeking to rise at the end of the statement about the murder of the Observer journalist when, again, we were not called. Like myself, other hon. Members may wish to raise constituency interests and perhaps you could bear that in mind the next time——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first part of the hon. Gentleman's comments is a matter of speculation, because no such question has been tabled. On the second part, I remind him and the whole House that it would be easy for the Chair to allow questions on statements to run out. It would be equally unfair to hon. Members who wish to participate in subsequent debates. I have mentioned today——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): This one is more important.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Well, it is an important debate, in which there is a great interest. I have to make a judgment on these things.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I hope that hon. Members who are now rising do not wish to raise points with me that they might have put to the Secretary of State had they been called.

Mr Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Because of the great care, consideration and surveillance of the Department of Trade and Industry, one of my constituent companies took months to obtain a licence to export non-military goods——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That can be dealt with on another occasion. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. Dickens: My constituent company would expect me to be called.

Mr. Speaker: Order. No. It might have expected that, but many other right hon. and hon. Members wish to participate in the next debate.

Mr. Dickens: There were only three hon. Members left standing on each side.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very selfish for the hon. Member to believe that he should be called in preference to his colleagues.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether there is a special Standing Order which has escaped my attention in respect of the protection of Ministers when they are under fire. It is becoming increasingly evident to many of us on this side that there must be an order which you observe which is a kind of "protect Nicholas Ridley society". In view of the last time on the Fayeds and again today——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a disreputable charge for the hon. Member to make. He would be absolutely the first to come to me if he was cut out of a subsequent debate.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You are constantly exhorted at Question Time to get through as many questions as possible. Today you managed to get through no less than 43 questions. Unfortunately, however, you did so only because 30 Labour Members who had important questions on the Order Paper did not turn up to ask their questions. Those of us who are interested in Trade and Industry questions seek your protection to allow us to raise important matters. I wonder whether consideration could be given in such circumstances to your looking through the long end of a telescope to see hon. Members who are not here in order that questions that are on the Order Paper are asked and brought before the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member was called twice, so I do not think that he has any crib.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you confirm that when a senior member of the Cabinet asks to make a statement in the House he makes it not only on behalf of his Department but of the Government as a whole? Might not it have been better to use other procedures? Four Departments wanted the matter questioned—the Treasury for Customs and Excise, the Foreign Office, the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry. In view of the suspicion that the Ministry of Defence has displayed a Nelson eye for some time on the Iraqi orders, is not it unacceptable, as the Defence Secretary was present and the Minister of State for Defence Procurement was sitting by his side, that when I simply asked for the date when the Department first knew about the matter—a simple, artless, factual question—I did not receive an answer? One should not be told that it is a matter for the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Speaker: I think that the hon. Member should table a question to the Secretary of State for Defence on such matters.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I called the hon. Member on the statement, but I will call him again if it is a point of order that I can answer.

Mr. Page: Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle), for which I thank him, and as the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has not had the courtesy to withdraw his remark, may I make it clear to the House that I am paid by no Government and no Government agency?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I rise on a point of order to try to establish better in my mind the criteria that you, Mr. Speaker, adopt when deciding how long ministerial statements will be allowed to run. We have just returned from a fairly generous Easter recess—[HON. MEMBERS: "Some of you."]—Some of us have. During that time, the matter which was the subject of the previous statement was running as a major item on all the news bulletins and was on the front pages of all the newspapers. There was——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that we have had enough of that.

Mr. Banks: I am just trying to ask you, Mr. Speaker, how you decide how long a statement will run.

Mr. Speaker: I will tell the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Banks: That is all I asked.

Mr. Speaker: That is very offensive——

Mr. Banks: You have been offensive to me, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: —but I will tell the hon. Gentleman. The Chair has an obligation to balance the time available in the House and the hon. Gentleman has frequently been to see me to express his distress at not being called in debate.

Mr. Banks: No, I have not.

Mr. Speaker: Then I hope he never will.

Mr. Banks: There would not be much point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to balance these matters. There is great pressure to take part in the coming debate. As a result of these points of order, I regret that all the hon. Members who wish to participate are unlikely to be called.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am deeply disturbed at the failure of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to make a statement this afternoon about the slaughter of the four members of the Ulster Defence Regiment outside Downpatrick during the recess. The impression is gaining ground among people in Northern Ireland that IRA murders are so commonplace that the Government do not feel that they have to make a statement, which would give Members from Northern Ireland an opportunity to put questions about the security situation in the Province. As there is this crisis of confidence, and the Ulster Defence Regiment is under attack not only from the IRA, but by its propagandists, surely the Government should come to the House to make a statement about those murders and allow Members of Parliament from Northern Ireland to question them.

Mr. Speaker: That will have been heard by the Leader of the House, but whether statements are made is not a matter for me.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

FISHING VESSELS

That the Fishing Vessels (Acquisition and Improvement) (Grants) (Amendment) Scheme 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 685) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

VALUE ADDED TAX

That the Value-Added Tax (Transport) Order 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 752) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Dorell.]

Question agreed to.

National Lottery

4.17 pm

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): I beg to move,

> That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for a national lottery to be held for the benefit of the arts, sport and the environment in the United Kingdom.

I wish to place on record my thanks for the help and support I have received in seeking to promote a national lottery from Europrint, for whom I was previously a consultant, from Lord Birkett, and particularly from the international conductor, Dennis Vaughan, without whose dedication and hard work, public support for a lottery would not be at its current high level.

It will not have escaped the notice of hon. Members that not all forms of new taxes are universally popular, and the words of Thomas Jefferson in 1826 are as accurate now as they were then:

> "Lotteries are the perfect tax, paid only by the willing."

Lotteries have existed for centuries. The Romans participated in them as a form of entertainment, and by the early 1700s, European Governments had begun to recognise the revenue potential of lotteries and started to license their operation. Revenues were used to finance the construction of roads, schools and churches. Unfortunately, by the mid-1800s, even Government-controlled lotteries were falling prey to abuses and fraud, and lotteries fell into disrepute. The advent of computer technology and improved communications has changed all that and made safe, honest lotteries once more a practical proposition.

Today, 116 countries throughout the world have lotteries. They have been used to finance the building of Sydney opera house, to fund the Olympic games in Moscow and Mexico and to build the great American universities of Yale and Harvard. Although Britain has benefited in the past from national lotteries—the British museum was built using funds from them, for instance—Britain and Albania are now the only two countries in Europe that do not have a national lottery.

Dennis Vaughan said in a recent article:

> "Everyone agrees about the necessity of funding for health, education, pollution, children, old age and the like, so they should come out of common taxation. There will never be agreement about the various merits of arts, sport and the visual aspects of the environment, so the only fair way is to pay for them by voluntary taxation . . . a lottery."

I share that view and I believe that the arts, sport and the environment deserve increased resources because they contribute significantly to the quality of life.

Many of the problems that we face underline the need for greater provision. Claudio Abbado, the great conductor, pointed out that, whenever youngsters participate actively in classical music, there is no drug problem; yet young people who live in the west and east of England have to rely on visits from London orchestras to be able to listen to first-class musicians, and the Welsh national opera has no home.

Those who practise sport regularly find that it is the best antidote to misery, despair and indolence, which are often cited as causes of the tendency to drug taking. Participation in sport also helps people to rid themselves of untold frustrations which often lead to violence.

There is an urgent need for extra sports facilities for our young people. A letter that I have received from the Amateur Swimming Federation of Great Britain makes the point that swimming and sport in general in our country are being left behind their counterparts in the countries with which we compete. Facilities here are poor compared with those in other west European countries. A similar story can be told about most other sports. Much of the time freely given by thousands of volunteers to help young people participate in sport is spent in fund raising. The tremendous support for the idea of a national lottery from environmental groups underlines the necessity for a major new injection of funds into many areas of their work.

We have the need for extra resources; we have the desire to take part in a national lottery with a prize of £1 million or more. In a recent opinion poll, 44 per cent. of people said that they would buy a ticket each week, 71 per cent. said that they were fairly likely to buy a ticket and only 6 per cent. said that they were certain not to buy one.

I referred earlier to a new injection of funding. I have no doubt that the introduction of a British national lottery will result in a significant increase in resources for sports, the arts and the environment. Projected sales of lottery tickets, arrived at by taking the per capita spend on lotteries in EC countries, produces a figure of £3·1 billion. If 45 per cent. of the proceeds are returned in prize money and another 20 per cent. allocated to expenses, we are left with 35 per cent. to distribute to the various causes. That would allow £1 billion more to be spent on sports, the arts and the environment each year.

That sum could fully fund a symphony orchestra in each regional centre, retain famous works of art in this country and increase support for young talent throughout Great Britain. It could also provide a new national stadium built to the highest Olympic standards, a fully funded research centre for sports medicine and scholarships for aspiring young athletes, in addition to extra facilities nationwide. It could also improve the environment by helping the conservation of land and waterways and the preservation of wildlife.

All this could be done with just one year's revenue from a British national lottery, and it would be extra money. It is my intention that the amount raised for sport, the arts and the environment should be in addition to current levels of Government spending, not a substitute for them.

It is clear that many people in Britain want to buy lottery tickets. Many are already doing so, not least for the West German lottery. It is unfortunate that the money that they are spending is being used to improve German roads, hospitals and facilities, whereas it should be used to benefit people in Great Britain. Unless we act, we shall continue to ensure that the money that we lose ends up in Cologne, Bonn or Hamburg instead of Colchester, Birmingham or Hyndburn.

To the extent that many people are already buying tickets, many of the arguments against a British national lottery are now irrelevant. In the past, fears have been expressed that a national lottery could damage charity and sports club lotteries and the football pools, and could encourage compulsive gambling. I believe that such fears are groundless. Evidence collected in the United States shows that, contrary to charities' first expectations, their ticket sales actually increased.

Ireland satisfied the concerns of the charity lotteries by including a clause in its legislation to compensate them for any loss of income incurred as a result of the introduction of a national lottery. In over two years since the launch of the lottery, no claim has been received. In an interdepartmental working party report on lotteries in 1975, the pools companies stated that a vigorous pools industry and large lotteries were compatible. I believe that a national lottery based on a "rub-off" ticket would have little effect on the pools.

I reject, too, the fears about compulsive gambling, which flourishes in enclosed environments, such as casinos, slot machine arcades and betting shops where the risks are high, the action fast, the results determined quickly and where gamblers can use their perceived skill to beat the system. Lotteries have none of those elements, so they do not lead to compulsive gambling.

I welcome the support that the Bill has received from hon. Members of all parties. I have described evidence of the need for a lottery, of support for a lottery and of the desire of the majority of people to take part in a lottery. We in this House should be the last people to oppose a lottery. We have to enter a lottery every day to ask a question, and every year to introduce a private Member's Bill. If we are committed to extending consumer freedom and promoting voluntary action, we should give this Bill our full support.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ken Hargreaves, Mr. Patrick Cormack, Sir Cyril Smith, Miss Kate Hoey, Mr. Dennis Turner, Mr. Peter L. Pike, Mr. David Amess, Mr. Alastair Burt, Mr. Simon Burns, Mr. David Evennett and Miss Ann Widdecombe.

NATIONAL LOTTERY

Mr. Ken Hargreaves accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for a national lottery to be held for the benefit of the arts, sport and the environment in the United Kingdom: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 May and to be printed. [Bill 124.]

Orders of the Day

Courts and Legal Services Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have selected the reasoned amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. In view of the somewhat late start to this debate and the pressure to speak, I ask right hon. and hon. Members to make brief speeches, please, so that all who wish to participate may do so.

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

In the opinion of the Government, going to law in civil cases is all too often unduly complex. All too often it is needlessly inconvenient, takes too long, and can be disproportionately expensive. Therefore, part I of the Bill is intended to make the public's access to justice simpler, quicker and more convenient. It is a shame that the Bill upsets the Labour party, whose motion declines a Second Reading to the Bill.

The objective of part II of the Bill is the development of legal services for the public, in particular in advocacy, litigation, conveyancing and probate. It opens the door to new ways or better ways of providing these, while maintaining always the proper and efficient administration of justice. It, therefore, seeks to stimulate competition and foster high standards of professional service to the public. Again, it is a shame that those objectives seem to find insufficient favour with the Labour party. The Bill is apparently beyond amendment. Labour Members would refuse it a Second Reading. I must, therefore, take a little time to explain what they suggest the House should vote against.

I will begin by recalling the civil justice review. In 1985 the review body was established by a Conservative Lord Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend Lord Hailsham, who charged it to improve the machinery of civil justice in England and Wales and in particular to reduce delay, cost and complexity.

The review body reported in 1988 with recommendations that were widely applauded at the time. Its report was only the second in this area to propose major changes since 1869, when the creation of the Supreme Court of Judicature was proposed, so the proposals were extremely important. Most of the review's recommendations requiring primary legislation are given effect in part I of the Bill. The main thrust of part I is to allow all civil cases to be dealt with at the appropriate level and no higher.

The key conclusion of the review was that relatively few of the cases now being handled in the High Court need to be handled there because they are not of sufficient weight or complexity to justify that. Therefore, the major change made possible in part I is the reserving of the High Court for judicial review cases, for other specialist cases, and for general cases of unusual substance, importance or difficulty. That follows the key recommendation of the civil justice review. The result will be to speed up the handling of cases remaining in the High Court, and to make the cheaper, speedier, and more convenient procedures and service provided by the county courts available now for those cases which are smaller and less complex.

The road leading to that reform will have to be travelled by stages. The county courts do not as yet have all the procedures or the resources that the increased work load will require. The Lord Chancellor has said that the transfers of work will not be made until the proper resources are available in the county courts to deal with them. However, a large amount of the necessary work is already under way—for example, the preparation of new procedures for the handling of payments following a court judgment, known as suitors' cash. From this month most payments will pass directly from debtor to creditor without having to be handled by the court. That should make the equivalent of some 300 posts in the court service available for other work. The work already under way includes the centralised issuing, from Northampton, of county court summonses at the suit of major creditors. The saving there should be the equivalent of another 50 full-time posts by late this year.

The work already under way also includes the establishment, on a much greater scale than presently, of county courts where long trials can receive a continuous hearing, and avoid that bane of the county court practitioner, to say nothing of the judiciary and the parties concerned, of having one adjournment after another. Already there are nearly 50 such continuous trial centres, and it is hoped that within two years most trials of any significant length will be dealt with in those centres.

As for resources, in any event there is need already for an increase, and so this year extra funds are available which should provide for the court service as a whole an increase of around 350 staff over and above those already in post. Changes to be effected may require up to 100 further posts themselves, so I emphasise that the Government intend first to recruit the staff that the changes will require. The Opposition's motion to convey the idea that the Government are neglecting to provide the resources that the reforms in the Bill will demand therefore cannot be justified. To rely on that notion as a reason for inviting the House to vote against the Bill, with all the benefits that it will achieve for the public in terms of cost-effectiveness, competition and convenience in the provision of legal services, is an excuse that falls some way short of being persuasive.

We must travel the reforming road in stages. The changes in the jurisdiction of the county courts, and in the system of allocating cases to them, will be achieved not all at once but by a series of orders to be made by the Lord Chancellor. My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor envisages that the first order would require that all but the most substantial of personal injury cases would have to begin in a county court, and all general actions below a financial limit to be set by the order and proceeding to trial would have to be heard in a county court, unless they were exceptionally complex or important. It is intended that the Lord Chancellor's first such order will not take effect before January 1991. Full consultation about it is about to begin and it will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure.

Before leaving part I of the Bill, I should mention, at the other end of the scale, the small claims procedure. The House may recall that the civil justice review examined that procedure and found that it had proved its worth. Cases are automatically dealt with as small claims if their value is £500 or less. The Government intend that the limit should be increased to £1,000 by rules of court, to implement one of the review's recommendations. Additionally, part I of the Bill makes new arrangements for representations by lay persons, both for litigants in small claims and for those in debt cases and housing cases proceeding in the county court. Litigants can be represented, but not necessarily by a lawyer.

That part of the Bill certainly justifies the Government's claim that it will make public access to justice simpler, quicker and more convenient. It will also make it more cost-effective. That will be in the interests of everyone—not least the legally-aided litigant. Because legal aid has been the subject very recently of substantial legislative reform, and as work arising from that reform is already proceeding separately, the Bill rightly does not contain a major element dealing with legal aid. However, legal aid is, of course, central to the Government's overall aims because it is an essential service for people who cannot themselves pay, whether in part or in full, for access to legal advice and legal representation.

It is estimated that 259,000 civil legal aid certificates will be issued in 1989-90, compared with 190,000 certificates 10 years ago. In November, the Lord Chancellor introduced a package of improvements to eligibility arrangements which will confer real benefits on three important classes of people—children, pensioners living off their savings, and those involved in personal injury cases. That change brings 5 million children into the scope of legal aid. Already under way is a full review of the financial conditions for legal aid across the board, both civil and criminal. The Lord Chancellor has given assurances in another place that people currently eligible for legal aid will not lose when the Bill comes into force.

When so much is already in train under the Legal Aid Act 1988 and by way of the review for the development of legal aid services, it is idle to criticise the Bill for not dealing additionally to the large extent that it already does with matters relating primarily to legal aid. To vote against the Bill on that ground does not seem awfully respectable.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Does the Attorney-General accept that 15 million fewer people are eligible for legal aid this year compared with 1979? Does he acknowledge that, no matter that he is changing the structure of the court system and transferring cases from the High Court to the county court, if people are unable to bring their cases before the court because they fail legal aid eligibility criteria there is no point in changing the structure?

The Attorney-General: As to eligibility, the Lord Chancellor has said that by one calculation it does appear that a smaller percentage of people—56 per cent. today rather than 70 per cent. a few years ago—may be eligible for legal aid. However, it is difficult to be satisfied as to the right basis for making that calculation. One calculation is based on the family expenditure survey, which adopts a different definition of a household from that adopted for the purpose of eligibility for the legal aid scheme. I suggest that it is more important to concentrate on identifying which particular types of litigation cost and candidates for legal aid really need to be assisted from public funds, in order to provide access to the courts for different, specific purposes. That is one of the most important functions of the review now being undertaken.

[The Attorney-General]

Part II of the Bill particularly concerns the provision of legal services. Under our statute and common law in England and Wales, the authority or right to provide legal services for reward is generally restricted to those who hold professional qualifications. In general, our courts have no investigative powers of their own and therefore rely, perhaps to a unique extent, on the quality of the legal profession that serves both courts and public.

Obviously the qualities of integrity and fearlessness are pre-eminent, but it is also highly important to ensure that the profession remains responsive and sensitive to the needs of people who require the services of lawyers. It must never give the appearance of being remote.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Is not the cab rank principle extremely important in this connection, ensuring that cases are taken by counsel and by solicitors?

The Attorney-General: I entirely agree, and I shall say more about that later.

In recent years the legal profession has undergone and absorbed many great changes, a number of which it has instituted or introduced itself. Solicitors and barristers can now advertise their practices—and, what is more, their charges—and they do so. The Bar allows its members to accept instructions in certain kinds of work from professionals who are not solicitors; a new profession of licensed conveyancers has been created, and solicitors now charge highly competitive prices for conveyancing work. Training within each branch of the profession has been completely transformed.

No less important than those changes, however, is the need to help the evolution to continue by ensuring that there are no unnecessary restrictions to hinder the public in their attempts to obtain legal services. If competition, for example, were unnecessarily restrictive, so that new or better ways of providing legal services—or a wider choice of people to provide them—became needlessly shut out, that would be a good example of what I mean. The Government believe that the general test should be whether a restriction is appropriate to maintain the proper and efficient administration of justice—if it is not, it should go.

For example, the Government understand very well the need to ensure that legal services continue to be of high quality if the public are to be protected. Those who provide them must therefore be properly qualified and properly accountable—accountable to the client, to their professional body and to the courts.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): I agree very much with what my right hon. and learned Friend is saying about the quality of the service provided, particularly by barristers, and by solicitors representing clients in the higher courts. Can he not say, even at this late stage, that the Goverment will introduce a provision to allow clients to claim against their barrister if he is negligent—if he does not turn up in court, for instance, or does not do his homework? Surely, if we are to guarantee quality and give certain people a monopoly to represent clients in court, we should allow those clients to obtain legal redress if their representatives are negligent.

The Attorney-General: The immunity from actions for negligence which has long been accorded to barristers by common law, and which the Bill extends to all advocates, is very closely confined. It deals only with the conduct of a case, principally in court. It was confirmed in two House of Lords judgments—Rondel v. Worsley 1967, and another in the following decade. The Bill preserves that narrowly confined immunity in the public interest. It is important, for example, that an action for negligence based on the way in which an advocate conducts a case "on his feet" in court does not lead to a retrying of the whole issue. Without the immunity, that would be almost inevitable and very much against the public interest. In many instances, however, a breach of duty by advocates —including barristers, of course—at present gives rise to a liability in relation to negligence, and that will continue.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): As I am sure my right hon. and learned Friend will accept, immunity at the Bar is not the only immunity. Witnesses giving evidence in the box are immune from action—as, most notably, are hon. Members in the House.

The Attorney-General: My hon. Friend makes an apt and accurate point.

The Government propose that in future rights of audience before a particular court should depend solely on whether advocates can demonstrate that they have received the appropriate education and training, and are bound by the appropriate codes of conduct. The Government consider that that fitness to practise is best established by professional bodies and other organisations whose members provide legal services, and that it is for such bodies to satisfy the courts and the public that their members can meet the high standards of competence and conduct required for the exercise of rights of audience.

Those requirements are at the heart of the Government's intentions, and are secured by the statutory objective and the general principle for which clause 15 expressly provides. The statutory objective is the development of legal services in England and Wales through provision for new or better ways of providing those services and a wider choice of people providing them, along with the constant maintaining of proper and efficient administration of justice. The general principle is that the question whether a person should be granted a right of audience in relation to any court or proceedings, or should be granted a right to conduct litigation, should be determined only by reference to certain specific factors.

First, it should be established whether that person is qualified in accordance with the educational and training requirements appropriate to that court or those proceedings. Secondly, it should be established whether he is a member of a professional or other body that has rules of conduct governing the conduct of its members, has an effective mechanism for enforcing those rules and is likely to enforce them. The rules—in relation to the particular court or proceedings—must be appropriate in the interests of the proper and efficient administration of justice. It will not be enough if they are simply appropriate to preserving the interests of the body concerned.

In relation to rights of audience in any of the superior courts, a fourth factor was added by amendment in another place. That brings me to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman). The fourth factor is the question whether a professional body's rules of conduct include provisions embodying what is loosely called the cab rank principle, subject to reasonable exceptions. The amendment—now contained in clause 15(3)(d)—excluded from its ambit the rights of audience in the superior courts that solicitors currently enjoy.

The question in another place was whether that principle needed to be spelt out in the Bill. I can now tell the House that the Government have decided to accept it, and to include it in clause 15. It may be generally described as the principle of non-discrimination by a practitioner between prospective clients in any area of law in which he practises as an advocate. Provision will, however, be needed to ensure that employed advocates may be allowed, by the operation of the machinery set up by the Bill, to act only for their employers in whatever court or proceedings in which they may have a right of audience.

The Government support that principle, considering it to be in the general interests of prospective clients and the administration of justice. For that reason, having consulted the Law Society and the Bar Council, they propose that clause 15 should provide for a wider application of it than is achieved by subsection (3) (d). They propose that it should apply to all rights of audience granted by a professional body, in whatever court or proceedings.

The Government will introduce their own amendment to give effect to that policy in due course. What is more —consistent with the principle of non-discrimination— they will introduce amendments to apply to the Bar the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 to cover discrimination in professional relationships, both at the Bar and between barristers and those instructing them.

Advocacy, litigation, conveyancing and probate services are the main services covered by the relevant part of the Bill.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Can the Attorney-General confirm that the principle of non-discrimination will ensure that there is no discrimination against those potential clients who are in receipt of legal aid?

The Attorney-General: It would not be right for me to anticipate the formulation of the amendment that the Government will introduce to give effect to the principle of non-discrimination. When it is introduced, there will be ample opportunity for the Standing Committee to discuss it and I trust that the Committee will be graced by the presence of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile).

The four categories—advocacy, litigation, conveyancing and probate—are very different in character, their only common feature being that under our law they can be undertaken for reward only by a professional with specific qualifications. Part II of the Bill provides three separate ways to permit development in those areas. The first covers advocacy and the conduct of litigation, which are the two categories of work upon which the administration of justice by the courts crucially relies. That first way employs a process by which an appropriate body may be authorised to grant to its members the right to undertake advocacy and litigation rights. That process is developed from the present statutory and common law arrangements, in which the judiciary is involved, whereby such rights are granted.

Although the Bill provides the mechanism as well as the impetus for change, it also preserves the position of solicitors and barristers by providing that the Law Society and the Bar Council shall be deemed to have granted to solicitors and barristers the rights that they respectively hold at present. They will be deemed to have been authorised to do so consistently with the requirements of the Bill by virtue of their existing regulations and rules.

If a new body were to seek authorisation to enter that area or if the Law Society or the Bar Council wished to grant an extension or alteration of existing rights to their members, there would be a need under the new arrangements to secure the approval of the Lord Chancellor and the designated judges in accordance with the new procedure. The road which may lead to such approval is mapped out in schedule 4. It leads first to the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee on legal education and conduct. That committee will be established under clause 17, and it must first consider the matter. There will be a lay majority on the committee, to illustrate the importance of the public's interest. A Law Lord or a judge of the Supreme Court will be in the chair. The committee will have the general duty of assisting in the maintenance and development of standards in the education, training and conduct of those offering legal services.

The second stage will be for the Lord Chancellor to consider, with the advice of the committee and of the Director General of Fair Trading, whether in connection with the proposals the members of the applicant body will be suitably qualified and whether they will be subject to appropriate codes of conduct, which will be enforced.

The third stage will be for the Lord Chancellor to inform the four most senior judges of the Supreme Court either that he proposes to give his approval to the application or alteration, or alternatively why he proposes to withhold it. Those judges, called in the Bill the designated judges, are the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, the President of the Family Division and the Vice-Chancellor. If the Lord Chancellor or any of the designated judges is satisfied that approving the application would be incompatible with the statutory objective or the general principle established in clause 15, he must refuse his approval. If, on the other hand, each of the judges concurs with his proposal to give approval, approval will be given.

The Government consider that those arrangements continue, in an appropriate way, the long-established involvement of the judiciary in the control of proceedings in the courts in which they sit. However, the arrangements regulate the exercise of judicial involvement in that area by reference to the statutory objective and the general principle established in the Bill. For example, if a designated judge were to refuse to concur with the Lord Chancellor's proposal to approve an alteration to the rules of conduct of, say, the Law Society, his refusal would have to be compatible with his specific duty, imposed by clause 16, to act in furtherance of the statutory objective and in accordance with the general principle. If it were not so compatible, it would be subject to judicial review.

The Government believe that the establishment of safeguards for the public, by the means that I have described, is a proper and important function of the Bill. It is intended to secure, as a result, that only those who are adequately trained, experienced and regulated will become newly authorised to exercise rights of audience or rights to conduct litigation.

Advocacy is not only a particular skill; it is a particular service to the courts and to the public, and one upon which the courts implicitly rely. It is important that all those wishing to appear in the higher courts should be appropriately trained and qualified. It is important also that the courts can always rely upon an advocate placing his duty to the court before his duty to his client.

The framework in part II of the Bill permits change to evolve in the light of all those considerations, and subject always to the over-arching safeguard that the proper and efficient administration of justice must be maintained. The safeguards rightly embodied in the Bill in no way detract from the aim of removing unnecessary restrictions, which is the policy which part II is intended to implement. Yet they are wholly compatible also with the great importance that the Government attach, as the Lord Chancellor has said, to the continued existence of a vigorous and independent Bar.

The second way of permitting development to be created by part II of the Bill concerns the right of financial institutions and others to do the conveyancing work that is currently restricted to the legal profession, notably solicitors and licensed conveyancers. The Bill sets up an authorised practitioner scheme. The proposals will supersede those of the Building Societies Act 1986, which have not been implemented and which will be repealed.

The proposals in the White Paper would have enabled the Lord Chancellor to recognise professional and other bodies as suitable to grant their members the right to provide conveyancing services to their borrowers, subject to appropriate standards of competence and conduct. However, when more detailed development of this proposal was carried out, it led the Government to conclude that, on balance, it was better to set up a single regulatory body responsible for the authorisation, supervision and discipline of the new authorised practitioners.

The Bill therefore establishes a new and independent Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board to take on those functions. It will have the duty to seek to develop competition in the provision of conveyancing services. Its constitution, procedure and powers can be found in schedule 5. The board may make rules providing for a compensation scheme for clients who have suffered loss through dishonesty by authorised practitioners or their employees. Conveyancing work by solicitors and licensed conveyancers in private practice will continue to be regulated by the Law Society or by the Council for Licensed Conveyancers. The board will be required to set up a conveyancing ombudsman scheme, to which all authorised practitioners must belong. The conveyancing ombudsman, not the board, will deal with the individual customer's complaints.

The Government recognise that, for most people, the process of buying and selling their homes is the most important financial event of their lives and accordingly the Government take consumer protection issues in that area very seriously. A mainstay of consumer protection under the authorised practitioner scheme will be the regulations on competence and conduct to be made by the Lord Chancellor under clause 39. The matters which may be included in those regulations are based on those set out in the code of practice, whose main principles were published in the Green and White Papers last year.

As the Lord Chancellor has said in another place, those regulations will be the subject of wide consultation and they will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. It will be one of the functions of the board to make arrangements designed to ensure that authorised practitioners are complying with those regulations. The Lord Chancellor has wide powers under clause 39 to make regulations covering not only matters relating to competence and conduct, and the protection of the interests of clients, but also the maintenance of fair competition between authorised practitioners and others providing conveyancing services.

Those provisions are designed to develop, with proper safeguards, further competition in the conveyancing market. The Bill will prevent the tying-in to a mortgage of an obligation to purchase other services.

The Government do not believe that the existing national network of independent solicitors will be undermined by these initiatives. We are well aware of the importance of ready access to legal services for the public, and of the importance of local solicitors' firms in all our constituencies to secure that. But I think that solicitors will be well able to compete to retain conveyancing business in the future. A survey carried out by the National Consumer Council showed that over half the population would prefer to have conveyancing done by an independent solicitor rather than by a lending institution, and that confirms the findings of a separate Law Society survey.

I am sorry to take so long, Madam Deputy Speaker, but the Bill covers a wide ambit and I hope to cover the main provisions. I have nearly finished.

The third way to permit development which is established by the Bill consists of new arrangements about probate work. The Bill proposes that banks, building societies, insurance companies and their subsidiaries should for reward be able to prepare applications for a grant of probate. At present that work is restricted to solicitors, barristers and notaries. Institutions will be required to belong to a suitable complaints scheme.

There is also provision for the Lord Chancellor to extend to professional or other bodies, having consulted the advisory committee and the President of the Family Division, the right to authorise their members to do this work if they satisfy statutory standards of conduct and of competence.

The Government attach much importance to the need to maintain the present high standards of competence and integrity in the provision of legal services. We believe complaints procedures that are truly effective are an important way to achieve that. The Bill accordingly provides for the creation of a new legal services ombudsman, with a significantly wider jurisdiction and greater powers than were given to the office of the lay observer, which it replaces.

The ombudsman will be able to investigate the handling of complaints by professional bodies that relate to solicitors, barristers, notaries and licensed conveyancers; to investigate the original complaint; and, where a complaint is found to be substantiated, to recommend that compensation be paid by the practitioner or by the body concerned.

The Law Society has also put forward to the Government proposals to amend the legislation governing its own complaints handling powers and procedures, and in particular to allow it to direct solicitors to pay compensation to clients who have received inadequate professional services. The Government have welcomed that initiative and they intend to bring forward the necessary amendments as soon as possible.

The Bill also removes or clarifies a number of miscellaneous, statutory or common law restrictions on the organisation and practice of the legal profession.

Practitioners will no longer be stopped by law from making even limited kinds of conditional fee arrangements, and barristers will be able to enter into contracts for their services.

The statutory ban on solicitors entering into partnerships with other professionals will also go. That will not, however, stop the Law Society adopting professional rules to deal with such matters if it wants to do so. The point is that the Government see no justification to retain such a provision in main legislation.

The Law Society would also be enabled to make rules regulating the formation of partnerships with lawyers from other jurisdictions. Secondary legislation under the Companies Act 1985 will also be brought forward to allow such partnerships to be formed with more than 20 partners, provided that the majority of the partners are subject to regulation by an appropriate professional body in the United Kingdom. That would remedy a concern raised in another place about the practical scope for such practices to be established.

Further provisions in part III of the Bill amend the qualification criteria for judicial appointments to reflect the changes in the arrangements for grants of rights of audience, and they revise the judicial pensions legislation, primarily to provide more fully for widowers' pension rights. Part IV amends the Solicitors Act as regards the regulation of the solicitors' branch of the profession and part V amends the law governing arbitration to permit an official referee to act as the sole arbitrator with the approval of the Lord Chief Justice.

Finally, there are a number of miscellaneous amendments which, for example, make provision in connection with the liability of magistrates and their clerks in actions for damages, and the award of costs in magistrates courts.

Heaven knows what tortuous transactions within the shadow Cabinet led to the decision to invite the House to vote against the Bill. It is a decision of which the right hon and learned and, I suspect, rather unhappy Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) on the Opposition Front Bench is the mournful inheritor. He will find it an inheritance of the kind that the Romans called hereditas damnosa—because he cannot get rid of it, and yet for all his considerable eloquence it will cost him his credibility to defend it.

As Mr. Marcel Berlins asked in The Guardian last week:

> "Just what is the Labour Party's policy towards the Lord Chancellor's Bill on the legal profession? Does anyone know?"

For this is a Bill which simplifies going to law, and makes it quicker, more convenient and more cost-effective. It widens the choice of practitioner—whether advocate, litigator or conveyancer; it stimulates competition; and it fortifies the client who has a grievance by creating an ombudsman for conveyancing and an ombudsman for legal services.

By all those measures and more besides the Government intend and believe that the public will have better access to justice. The Opposition wish the House to vote against the proposals, but I commend them to the House.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I beg to move, To leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

> "this House declines to give a second reading to the Courts and Legal Services Bill [Lords], which proposes substantial changes in the organisation of the courts and legal profession, but which fails to ensure sufficient resources for the efficient administration of the county courts; which fails to make the financing and administration of the courts and legal system accountable to this House; which neglects to deal with the denial of eligibility for legal aid, and fails to address itself properly to ensuring wider opportunities for legal representation; and which misses the opportunity to modernise the system of selection and appointment of the judiciary."

It was interesting that in his last few remarks—perhaps it was a Freudian slip—the Attorney-General was conceding that the Bill would be the interitance of an hon. Member on this side of the House; we noted that with glee. Perhaps he had not thought out the matter, because he was not looking at his notes at the time, but we take that concession and we shall use it fully, perhaps in a reasonably short time before the next election comes. We thank the Attorney-General.

Hardly anyone would quarrel with the Government's aims, as expressed in the Green Papers, to ensure that the public has the best possible access to legal services and that those services are of the right quality for the needs of the client.

The quarrel, which goes wider than the political spectrum, as the Attorney-General knows, is whether those aims will be achieved, in particular since the Government rely on free competition and the discipline of the market to achieve them. The writer of the Lord Chancellor's Green Papers and the White Paper is the handmaiden of the Department of Trade and Industry. They reek of the furnaces of that Department. I suspect that the fire had been lit before the present Lord Chancellor took office, probably unbeknown to his predecessors. It is against that background that we should judge whether the philosophy of market forces is appropriate for achieving the best for the consumer in an area where so much is taken on trust, and where integrity and independence are so vital.

It is sad and wrong that this is the first opportunity that the House, as the provider of supply, has had to discuss any of the proposals, which were first published as far back as January 1989. That underlines the need to transfer accountability for those parts of the Lord Chancellor's Department that deal with administration and finance, now that it is a significant spending Department, to the House.

The purpose of the Queen's courts, meeting as we do but a stone's throw from Westminster hall, is to serve the state and the citizen and in so doing to hold the balance between the Queen's peace, her Government and her subjects and between subject and subject.

The legal profession is the servant and the agent of those needs and exists for that purpose. It must be independent and fearless. The judiciary, drawn from that profession, and in whom is entrusted the holding of the balance, must of necessity be independent. Too frequently these days it is a popular cry to attack the judges. From time to time, I fear that individual judges deserve criticism. However, where there is a need for independence and integrity no one can be better trusted than judges, hence the need for them to exercise the greatest care when making extra-judicial comment.

However well-merited a proposal may be, it is of the utmost importance to weigh it against the background of whether it undermines the independence of the profession or of judges.

Labour Members do not disagree with the Government's proposals to open up advocacy to those who are properly qualified; hence, perhaps to the disappointment of the Attorney-General, we shall not vote against the Bill. We are concerned about its implementation and what is omitted from it—in the time-hallowed way of objecting to proposals as a whole because of omissions.

I make quite clear where our starting point is, in case it has escaped the attention of the Attorney-General. We shall not take up the cudgels on behalf of any part of the profession for the sake of obstructing the increased availability of talent in advocacy where it is of benefit to the client. I have no intention of defending over-restrictive practice for the sake of it. I fear that I am old enough to remember as a young circuiteer the restrictions on appearing off-circuit. Over the years, the Bar has rightly dismantled those restrictions.

Fears have been expressed about some of the present proposals and certainly about some of the original proposals. Some of those fears have been reduced, and the present proposals are an improvement on the Green Papers. With a little more groundwork and consultation, some of those fears might have been avoided.

I wish to ensure that the independence of the judiciary, which I hope we all treasure, is not undermined by a bureaucracy which owes itself to the favour of a Minister, who after all is a political figure. The Lord Chancellor's advisory committee must be funded through the Consolidated Fund to mark its independence and staffed to ensure, so far as practical, independence similar to that of the judiciary. Lord Rawlinson, a distinguished former Attorney-General, said in a dramatic part of his speech in the other place that nowhere outside a Marxist state does a Minister appoint judges and have the ultimate say in who may appear in courts before those judges.

The Lord Chancellor is therefore right to distance himself from too direct an involvement in the latter. It is right that he at least shares the ultimate responsibility with senior judges. Any attempt to water down the collective responsibility of judges, who have exercised such rights since time immemorial, would be wrong. We shall consider how the collective wisdom of judges is exercised. It is important that they are perceived not to be obstructive to the aims of the Bill if it is approved by Parliament. As the Attorney-General said, they will have to take account of the Act, and the advisory committee, with its lay majority, will be open to judicial review of their actions. To many, it is inconceivable that they would be obstructive, but it has been said and we should face up to it. I do not share that view.

Why do I lay such stress on the distancing of the licensing role of the Lord Chancellor compared with judges? For the administration of justice, Labour intends to create a Department that is directly answerable to the House. We are all aware of the anger of many hon. Members when a judge makes imprudent remarks, perhaps in a particular type of case. With a Minister directly answerable to the House, one can imagine a similar outcry when an advocate is denied his right to practise. It will therefore become even more important for the Lord Chancellor or his successor to minimise his involvement.

How important it is to have fearless and independent advocates when the Executive must be challenged in, for example, the process of judicial review, which involves many immigration cases, or where the cause is so odious that it is only because advocates are independent and fearless that the client can be satisfied that his case is being properly fought and that popular belief does not attach to the advocate the odium of the cause.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I am not certain that I have correctly understood him. Having stated the importance of an independent legal profession, he seemed to suggest a diminution in the independence of the judiciary by making their pronouncements subject to criticisms and overview in the Chamber. That would lead to political interference in judicial independence. That appertains in some systems, but I hope not in a parliamentary democracy such as ours.

Mr. Morris: If the hon. Gentleman looks carefully at my remarks he will discover that I said nothing of the kind. I underlined the Attorney-General's commitment to judicial review of any licensing in which judges are involved. I pointed out that, unhappily, judges are criticised inside and outside the House. When a Minister is directly involved in licensing, it will be not the judges who are criticised but the licensing and the actions of the Minister. That is the point that I was seeking to make. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand if I made it badly.

It would be a sad day if the finest advocacy were not available for odious cases to ensure that in the dispensation of justice every argument had been advanced in the exercise of every man's right under Magna Carta.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Am I wrong in believing that it is not possible to criticise judges in this House other than on a motion of both Houses?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): The hon. Lady is quite correct, but I have not heard the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) criticise a particular judge.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The right hon. and learned Gentleman was saying that judges can be criticised in the House, which is not so.

Mr. Morris: The hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) misunderstood my point. I am saying that, unhappily and regrettably, judges are criticised, whether one likes it or not. It is no good the hon. Lady shaking her head. I have been here long enough to know the correct processes. The hon. Lady has also been here a long time and knows that, rightly or wrongly, judges are criticised. I was not criticising judges but saying that when a Minister is directly answerable to the House, taking over some of the responsibilities of the Lord Chancellor's Department and being involved in licensing, more criticism will be made of him than when a judge occasionally makes an intemperate remark that does not find favour with people inside and outside the House. I hope that I have made my point abundantly clear. I thought that I had made it clear the first time, but I certainly made it clear the second time. I hope that I carry the hon. Lady with me now. [Interruption.] If I have not made it clear, I am prepared to repeat it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That would be tedious repetition.

Mr. Morris: I bow to your wisdom, Madam Deputy Speaker. I thought that I had made my point clear, but I am quite prepared to repeat it for the hon. Member for Lancaster.

It would be a sad day if odious causes did not have the availability of the finest advocacy to ensure that in the dispensation of justice every argument had been advanced in a particular cause. During debates in another place, the cab rank rule became more a matter of concern. Today the Attorney-General called it non-discrimination.

If enshrining that rule was expected to, and would, undermine the widening of advocacy rights in the Bill to qualified people, I would have no truck with it. It should not do that. As the Lord Chancellor said some years ago, wearing his hat as leader of the Scottish Bar,

> "this obligation is an important constitutional guarantee from the point of view of a citizen's freedom of access to the courts."

The rule does not exist for the sake of the Bar. It must be improved upon so far as it is exercised by the profession. It is not perfect and I welcome what the Attorney-General said about that this afternoon. The rule is part of the price that the Bar, as advocates, has paid for its monopoly of audience in the superior courts.

What should the rule mean? A practising advocate must be prepared, in the interests of enhancing access to justice, to take instructions from anyone, however odious his cause, in the field in which that advocate practises. Advocates cannot pick the popular as opposed to the odious causes or the easy as opposed to the difficult cases.

If we extend the privilege of advocacy, with it must go the burden of the cab rank. The client will know that he will have an advocate of his choice, subject of course to availability. The judge and jury will know, because of the nature of the advocate's duty to appear, that he is not identified with his client's cause. It would be short-sighted if the consumer failed to comprehend the magnitude of his loss in the long term if the rule was not maintained. It would be a grave restriction of the client's right of choice if the rule disappeared and all advocates were able to pick and choose.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): There is an anxiety here in that barristers, by introducing the clause about cab ranking, have tried to restrict competition from solicitors. As we are talking about the cab rank rule, is there not a case for saying that, as with black cabs, there should be a restriction on trade if there is a monopoly? If the principle is to be applied to two professions, should we not recognise that there are minicabs as well as black cabs and that there must be two systems instead of one?

Mr. Morris: My hon. Friend is wrong. If the rule disappeared or was not maintained or improved the client would lose. The rule matters not one iota to the profession. It is a burden on the profession, but a burden that it is prepared to carry, and has carried from time immemorial, as part of its privileges. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has done much for the consumer and the client, but they would lose out if there was no one left in the profession prepared to defend them. That is the important point.

The Yorkshire ripper must be defended and there must be a defender for the odious cause. The defence of an individual's liberty would be weakened if advocates were not available to defend that odious cause. We will have to examine the Attorney-General's proposals with great care to see what practical difficulties arise and then try to ensure that there is an effective solution that protects the consumer and the individual, because the principle exists for him.

I want now to refer to the extension of the rights of audience to all Crown prosecution service employees in the Crown courts. I fear that I envisaged Treasury pressure for that some years ago when I addressed a conference organised by Justice on the future of the profession. I surmise that it is the Treasury's belief that prosecutions by in-house advocates would be cheaper. The CPS employees believe that that practice will enhance their career prospects. All that is understandable, although it goes against assurances given by Lord Hailsham when the CPS was set up. However, we should examine that point.

In the immediate future, and perhaps for quite a few years, the CPS has enough work to get its house in order in relation to its existing functions. I do not blame the CPS for that. Rather, I blame its Treasury masters for under-funding and under-establishing the service. I believe that CPS employees receive inadequate salaries for their work and the responsibilities that they carry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), who assisted me in the House at the time of the creation of the CPS, warned the Attorney-General of the price that the service would be paying in its inability to attract the required number of staff because of the salary scales. Despite the improvements, my hon. Friend has been proved right.

Frankly, the Law Officers lost their battle with the Treasury over pay and they either badly under-estimated staffing levels, or they lost that battle, too. The service has still not recovered. I suspect, therefore, that the exercise of an extension of the right of audience is not an immediate prospect. I am concerned about the long-term effects.

A distinguished Treasury prosecutor, Mr. Roy Amlot QC, wrote a most challenging letter that appeared in The Times on 23 February last year. He underlined the importance in any serious crime of the independence of the prosecutor

> "owing no allegiance to the Government or Government Department, not motivated by results, advancement or the approval of his superiors."

He ended his letter stating:

> "The Green Paper has ignored a principle which ought to be of fundamental importance—the guarantee of an independent element in the State machinery of justice."

We must decide where the greater gain lies. Would independence be less or more with in-house prosecutors at Crown court level? Do serious and difficult cases require the independence that exists today? What would be the effect on the junior criminal Bar? What would be the effect of polarising advocates at the high level into prosecutors and defenders even more than they are sometimes today?

[Mr. Morris]

What would be the dangers if judges in future were drawn more from the ranks of prosecutors who had never defended?

The immediate gains of possible Treasury savings and enhancing career prospects should be weighed carefully against probable weightier disadvantages. It is curious that the Government, who are bent on privatising anything that moves, or anything that does not move, should consider further nationalisation of prosecutions. That has happened already. I wonder whether the Government's Right-wing think tanks have been consulted. The Prime Minister has an interest in the Bar and I have just read that she has become an honorary fellow—whatever that means—of the American Trial Lawyers. Does she know what the Attorney-General is about?

I want now to consider the importance of the high street solicitor. He or she is the public's point of access to the law. It would be a grave disadvantage to the public if his or her role was made more difficult of if services were made less comprehensive. The small firm will look carefully at the development of the City mega-firm with its in-house advocates who may be coralling all the work at its expense. I share some anxiety about institutions undertaking conveyancing work. We all want to make conveyancing as cheap as possible, particularly when the most important commercial transaction in most people's lives is buying a house. Certainly, over the years that process has become very much cheaper. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby has played a notable part in that process.

Safeguards regarding the independence of advice have been written into the Bill. As I said, the purchase of a house is the most important commercial transaction of people's lives. There have been massive developments in recent years with financial institutions taking over estate agencies. It is therefore even more important that the consumer is safeguarded and that the advice that he obtains is independent. Hon. Members will examine that part of the Bill more carefully.

There are two outstanding omissions from the Bill. The Attorney-General has dealt with them in part. First, there is a failure to ensure that adequate resources are provided for our county courts. Despite the Attorney-General's words, we certainly welcome the institutionalisation of the civil justice review in part I. Great progress has already been made by judges in redistributing work from the High Court to the county court under section 40 of the County Courts Act 1984, and masters and registrars have also transferred cases down. I was glad to hear of the number of county court centres where continuous trials can be heard. Nevertheless, there are horrendous tales of a lack of resources in county courts. Before the system in the Bill works, there must be adequate resources, and staff will need to be paid at a rate that will retain them. The state has taken their dedication for granted for far too long. What is the current rate of resignations by court staff in the Lord Chancellor's Department? Are the figures double those of comparable sections of the civil service?

I was shocked to read accounts in the other place about courts running out of their allocation of postage money, about a five-month delay of a 10-minute hearing in Birmingham, about a four-month delay in Bromley before a petition could be issued, and about a six-week delay in Swindon to get an injunction to protect a woman from her violent former boyfriend. If they are right, such tales mean that it is a pretty awful situation. The general public are probably under the impression that all trials continue from day to day until a case is finished. As the Attorney-General said, there is an increase in the number of places where there are continuous trials, but they may be the exception rather than the rule. What proportion of cases not finished on the same day must wait weeks before they are allocated another day to continue the hearing? The increase in costs is enormous, the strain for the litigant is unacceptable, and the pressure to settle in the meantime is considerable.

It is not only in county courts that penny-pinching rules the day. The other day, I was told of a court where the phone had been taken out of counsels' room because takings did not meet charges. In other courts, incoming calls are not allowed because there is no money in them for the Lord Chancellor's Department. I do not know of a court in which phonecard telephones are installed. In a profession in which communication is of the utmost importance and when the public and the profession need to be kept in touch, one marvels that the courts run as smoothly as they do. That telephone instance is just the tip of the iceberg. One hears horrendous tales of cash limits on courts and immense delays until more cash is made available merely to reply to correspondence. The Law Society has stated the problems in some detail in its memorandum to the Lord Chancellor.

There is strong evidence that the present county court system is working under great disadvantages. I welcome the increases envisaged and reported by the Attorney-General. If the Lord Chancellor's Department were properly accountable to this House for its finance and administration, as Opposition Members envisage in our motion, we would have examined matters long ago, either through a Select Committee or through other means. In the absence of a Select Committee, the Department has been able to avoid proper scrutiny. Until adequate resources are available part I of the Bill should not come fully into operation. Although the Lord Chancellor has accepted an amendment relating to an annual report on the business of the High Court and county courts, we must ensure that resources are available. It should be a statutory requirement to provide adequate resources for the courts.

I now refer to the Government's failure to provide adequate resources for the operation of the legal aid scheme and, in particular, the failure to extend legal aid to tribunals. Legal aid has been allowed to wither on the vine. It has been estimated that in 1979, 80·9 per cent. of householders were eligible for legal aid. By 1989, the figure had declined to 57 per cent. In 1979, 79·1 per cent. of individuals were eligible. Ten years later, the figure had declined to 53 per cent. Mr. Michael Murphy of the London School of Economics' department of statistical and mathematical science stated:

> "The assertions by successive Lord Chancellors and their Department, either that eligibility has remained unchanged or questioning whether previous estimates demonstrating a considerable fall are accurate, are inexplicable on rational grounds."

The Lord Chancellor, to meet widespread criticism, held a press conference shortly before the Queen's Speech, announcing "a new approach", which included this Bill. As the Attorney-General mentioned, that new approach included a general review, which will take up to three years, and a package of improvements for pensioners, children and personal injury cases. No comparable changes have been made in green form eligibility. The Attorney-General estimates that the changes will increase eligibility from 56 per cent. to 74 per cent. in personal injury cases.

But what of other matters in which assistance may be required? The president of the Law Society, Mr. David Ward, and the chairman of the general council of the Bar, Mr. Peter Cresswell QC, recently wrote a joint letter to the Lord Chancellor because of the profession's concern about declining eligibility. They share that concern with the Lord Chancellor's legal aid advisory committee. They pointed out that the basic uprating of about 5·2 per cent. will not even keep eligibility limits in line with inflation,

"let alone reverse the savage cuts in legal aid made over the past few years."

They are concerned with the formula, the scope and the time scale of the review. They endorse the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee's view that

"the downward drift of eligibility levels might gather momentum over this time."

They also pointed out that better targeting—this was mentioned in the Attorney-General's speech—might result in fewer people being eligible and might mean that those who are just above the eligibility level could be prevented, on financial grounds, from pursuing their legal rights argument. It is disingenuous for the Green Papers to suggest that the no win, no fee proposals will allow greater access to the law and somehow compensate for the lack of any extension of the legal aid system.

The president and the chairman have misgivings about the review being conducted behind closed doors and suggest that there should be an independent review, reporting within six months. I entirely agree. Not only is the existing legal aid scheme being allowed to wither, but there appears to be no hope of extending it to tribunals. The Bill's long title includes the challenging words "to make provision with respect to legal services".

Unhappily, the opportunity to spell out the path forward has not been grasped.

I wonder how many hon. Members have had to deal with case after case in their surgeries of constituents who are to appear before a tribunal in the following week with claims for mobility allowance, constant attendance allowance or unemployment benefit, for example. Although hundreds, if not thousands, of pounds are at stake, we know that many people go to those tribunals unrepresented. There must be something wrong if someone can get legal aid for a comparatively minor action in the county court, worth perhaps less than £2,000, yet a worker with 20 years' service, aged 54 and earning £200 per week, who alleges that he has been unfairly dismissed, receives no help whatsoever in presenting his case. He may not have the support of a trade union, whereas his employers may have in-house lawyers and will certainly have recourse to solicitors and barristers to represent them at the industrial tribunal, if they so wish. That employee might have a claim of up to £12,000 on the facts, but within the framework of the present legal aid system, no matter how strong his claim and no matter how large his potential award, he cannot get legal aid to assist him at the industrial tribunal. What is the logic——

Mr. Alex Carlile rose—

Mr. Morris: No, I shall not give way because I have almost finished.

What is the logic of drawing a distinction between those two cases and how can that distinction be maintained? Mr. Ward and Mr. Cresswell have expressed their concern about the lack of progress on tribunal representation. They suggest, first, that an order of priority should be worked out for extending legal aid to certain tribunals, starting with appeals to the social security commissioners. Secondly, they suggest that consideration be given to funding a national network of agencies for tribunal representation. That could at least be a start and we all await the Lord Chancellor's reaction.

In the absence of a positive reaction and in the light of the omissions that we have identified in our motion, while I do not recommend my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Bill's Second Reading, I urge them to support our motion in the Lobby.

5.43 pm

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I imagine that the debate will be dominated by lawyers. Indeed, I see around me in the Chamber predominantly hon. Members who are lawyers. The House knows that I am no lawyer, so I hope that I shall be forgiven if I make a few comments about the Bill from the point of view of the general public and their more mundane dealings with the legal professions.

I begin by giving the Bill a general welcome. I am especially glad that it has come to the House with a good deal more support from the various parts of the legal profession than it looked as though it would enjoy at one stage. That is to be welcomed. I pay tribute to the Law Officers who, I know, have worked hard to try to bring to Parliament a Bill that is not as contentious as at first appeared. If my right hon. and learned Friends on the Front Bench will forgive me, I want to pay a special tribute to the Lord Chancellor, for whom I have had the greatest possible admiration during the 11 years since he joined the Government.

However, I am concerned at some of the Bill's implications for some of the more mundane legal services. I am all for competition between lawyers and anybody else who is capable of performing competently the legal services that we are accustomed to solicitors performing. However, in the welcome move to opening up this area, I am concerned that, in fairness, we should not put solicitors at a disadvantage. Over the years, I have played my part in criticising solicitors and I do not suppose that I shall stop now, but they perform a great service to the public and it would be wrong to throw out the baby with the bath water, as the Bill does in certain respects. The principal purpose of my remarks is to draw attention to some of those instances and, in so doing, I acknowledge the advice that I have received from Westmorland Law Society.

Clauses 46 and 47 deal with probate. The Bill proposes to extend, under strict controls, the groups of people who are able to carry out legal work on deceased people's estates up to the point of a grant of probate. I have no quarrel with that. Until now, such work has, in practice, been confined to solicitors and to the trustee departments of the banks because, under the existing rules as I understand them, only solicitors can apply for a grant of probate. If that work is to be extended to wider groups, as the Bill proposes, we must ensure that those groups are competent and properly regulated. I am content that that seems to be being done. However, why is there no provision for regulation of the next stage, the administration of estates after the grant of probate? That work is enormously important, but I cannot find any proposals in the Bill to regulate the way in which solicitors —who in the past have been closely regulated in such matters—should administer estates after that point. Why have the Government not gone the whole way beyond the point of the grant of probate and applied regulations similar to those that already exist for solicitors to the new groups of people?

Sir Anthony Grant: We should bear it in mind that those other bodies, such as banks, charge on average two or three times as much as solicitors for administering estates.

Mr. Jopling: I do not know whether that is still the case, but my hon. Friend used to be a solicitor, so I am sure that that is a heartfelt point.

Creditably, the Bill puts right an anomaly in relation to mortgages. As things are at the moment, if a solicitor who arranges a mortgage for a client also arranges insurance cover, by arranging an endowment policy to cover the mortgage, as I understand it, the solicitor must account to his client for any commission of more than £10. In the past, that rule has not applied to a building society, so the present situation is fundamentally unfair. I am glad that the Bill puts it right to an extent. I notice that it will be put right by a regulation by the Lord Chancellor under clause 39, after the Bill has received Royal Assent. It is essential that, in clause 39, the regulations under subsection (2)(g) ensure that all authorised practitioners operate on a level playing field with regard to the disclosure of commission. That is an important consumer protection and I hope that that undertaking can be given.

My last point is about conveyancing. Both my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said how important conveyancing is. It is perhaps the most important single transaction that many people undertake in their whole lives. I welcome the setting up of an independent body, the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board, to make sure that those who will deal with conveyancing, apart from lawyers, are properly policed.

The Bill does not adequately deal with the onus on authorised conveyancing practitioners to give what the Financial Services Act 1986 describes as "best advice" on the financial services which are on offer. I say that because the position now is that many building societies are tied to a single insurance company. Here lies the problem. While a practitioner who is not tied to an insurance company must give that best advice on the whole of the insurance market, that is not so for the practitioner who is tied. I was surprised to discover that.

I received a letter dated 23 October last year from the Lord Chancellor on this point. He said:

> "In the case of the tied agent, however, this 'best advice' will be restricted to the range of products which are available from the company to which the adviser is tied."

As I understand it, that means that advice from an untied practitioner should never be worse but could often be better than the advice from a tied practitioner such as a building society tied to an insurance company. That is a most unsatisfactory position, and I hope that the Government will consider ways of surmounting the problem.

I suggest three ways in which the problem could be overcome. First, it might be possible to insist that the term "best advice" cover the whole of the insurance field, not, in the case of tied practitioners, simply the field available from the insurance company to which the practitioner is tied. Secondly, practitioners who are tied to an insurance company could be forced to provide more than one quote for insurance covering a mortgage. Thirdly, no practitioner could be allowed to place, say, a third, half or two thirds of his firm's life policies with any one company. Those are just three ideas that I throw out for consideration by my right hon. Friends.

I began by saying that the issues that I wished to raise were mundane. However, they are of crucial importance to a vast proportion of the general public. It is on probate, conveyancing and mortgages that the great majority of British people come across lawyers. I hope that those matters can be considered, and that, as the Bill continues through the House, it can be improved in order to deal with them.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): The right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) is under no obligation to apologise for speaking in the debate. This lawyer not only forgives him but welcomes him. Too many of our debates on legal subjects are confined to lawyers. If I may, I shall develop that theme in a few moments.

It is not every Bill that I wish to see initiated in another place and arrive in this House after an eventful career elsewhere. Most Bills of a controversial nature are better if they emerge from this House, where we can decide on principle whether they should survive or be mercifully dispatched, and proceed to another place for more careful scrutiny. Whether there is a better way of scrutinising Bills is not a theme on which I wish to embark in this debate. We have troubles enough for today.

But with this Bill our task has been facilitated by the careful examination that it received in another place. In deciding on its general principle, we know what is in the Bill, what is in the package, how it is wrapped, how it is likely to be presented and how and when we shall see it unwrapped. When we go through the Lobby tonight we shall know what is on offer. Perhaps uncharacteristically, I express gratitude to the other place for the careful scrutiny that the Bill has received.

I do not wish the Attorney-General to get the wrong idea. We shall not be entirely idle in Committee. I understand that the Lord Chancellor has taken up certain themes from another place which he wished to reconsider. It will be in the interests of constructive discussion and of the Government's business managers if they are introduced in good time in Committee.

Then again, the Attorney-General introduced a wholly new matter into the Bill today. I imagine that we shall probably welcome it, but I should have preferred to hear it for the first time from the Attorney-General rather than from my contacts in Fleet street. But let us not introduce a sour note into the debate at this early stage.

We shall not be entirely idle in Committee. We may have the odd improvement to suggest. I do not think so ill of the Attorney-General and the Lord Chancellor as to believe that they will all fall on deaf ears. However, it would not be realistic to hope that we can change this into a different Bill. When hon. Members go through the Lobby tonight they will know pretty well what is on the stall.

At the outset I declare an interest. I am a practising member of the Bar and I have been so continually for 37 years with an interruption of only five years when the Crown was my only client. It is true that for much of that time the Bar has not been my principal activity. But it has been one of my activities and whatever the other advantages of practising at the Bar, it has made me a better-informed, if not necessarily a wiser, parliamentarian. So I am sure that the House will make due allowance for whatever I say, and rightly so.

When an activity assumes the name and rank of a profession, practitioners are under numerous constraints to observe faithfully the standards of that profession. The original professional training, the opinion of the practitioner's peers, the social and cultural influences and, after a time, sheer habit are important protections for the consumers of those services. But what those standards are and the way in which they are expressed must be examined from time to time by people who are outside those influences.

I welcome the intervention of the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale because any profession may be tempted to adopt practices and to persuade itself that they are in the public interest when they really stem from the advantages that they confer on practitioners. That is one reason why I welcome the provisions in the Bill for the ombudsman.

There should be no complaints from the Bar when we are occasionally subjected to an inquiry by a royal commission, even if it transpires that ultimately its recommendations are ignored, as in the case of the Benson commission. The Lord Chancellor's Green Papers have impelled the Bar to look again at some of its own practices and itself to initiate some important changes.

I hope that other lay Members will participate in the debate and I shall try not to inhibit them by continuing for too long—[HON MEMBERS: "Famous last words."] Popularity is a wonderful thing.

I hope that I shall be forgiven if I take a moment of the time of the House on Second Reading to raise two questions of general principle. The first is the form of the Bill. It is largely an enabling Bill, which means that it does not say what will happen if it is passed into law, but it confers powers on various people to decide what will happen and when. We are asked to delegate powers to the Lord Chancellor to alter the allocation of business between courts and decide what is an authorised body, to the rules committee to decide on procedure and to the advisory committee to advise on the whole field of legal services and the work of the courts.

Some anxieties were rightly expressed in another place by Lords Rippon and Simon that Parliament is not being asked to examine the position to discover whether this is an appropriate time to open the floodgates for a vast increase in the work of the county court and assess whether the county court is in an appropriate condition to absorb and process it. We are being asked to empower the Lord Chancellor to decide when, and under what conditions, that will happen.

I need hardly say that I cast no reflections on and intend no disrespect to the present distinguished occupant of that high office. Indeed, it would be churlish not to place on record that his accessibility during the discussions on the Bill, and his generosity with his time, should serve as a model for all Ministers. However, there are judgments and assessments to be made as to whether that transfer is an appropriate step to take and, if so, whether this is an appropriate time to take it. Those are the responsibilities of Parliament. We cannot decide everything. Some of our problems relating to the length of our sittings, and the difficulties of including every hon. Member in our business, relate to our reluctance to delegate decisions which other legislatures find it sensible to delegate. You, Mr. Speaker, know that better than any of us.

But some of these decisions require a balance to be struck between different considerations and interests. They are political decisions, although probably not party-political ones in this case. They are decisions about how best to conduct the affairs of the body politic and they should be decided by the political process, after political debate by those who have to answer to their constituents at weekends and, probably, explain them in the British Legion club at 10.30 pm on a Saturday—[Interruption.] Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) does not have a British Legion club in his constituency. My hon. Friend indicates that he does, so I am receiving a sympathetic response.

It is not a complete answer to every question raised in the Bill to say that the Bill leaves the decision to the Lord Chancellor or distinguished senior judges or the advisory committee; we must assume that they will apply the right criteria and reach sensible conclusions.

If the Bill makes it possible for someone with no legal qualifications to acquire a right of audience in the High Court—I am not talking about barristers and solicitors, but people with no legal qualifications—and, having acquired that right of audience, to move from there to be appointed to the highest ranks of the judiciary, it is not enough to say that those who will advise on such matters will use their common sense and will not recommend unsuitable appointments. If we do not think it appropriate for those without legal qualifications to be appointed Lords of Appeal in Ordinary, we should not give anyone, however distinguished, the power to make such an appointment.

I venture to warn the Attorney-General, if he will forgive me, that if there is the power to appoint a surveyor as a High Court judge, in five years' time an hon. Member will ask the Attorney-General of the day how many surveyors have been appointed High Court judges. Someone will say, "If Parliament conferred the power, why has it not been exercised?".

It should not afford us great comfort to reflect that the delegates who take those decisions may be open to challenge. That merely introduces a further degree of uncertainty. If the rules relating to rights of audience are to be delegated to the Law Society and the general council of the Bar, it does not greatly cheer me to reflect that the Director General of Fair Trading may disagree with them and challenge what they decide. The considerations which may be uppermost in his mind, and which he is required by statute to have in mind, are not necessarily the considerations that we believe should prevail. That raises the second issue of principle which I want to introduce into the debate.

[Mr. Peter Archer]

The avowed purpose of the Bill is to extend to consumers of legal services a wider choice. I do not quarrel with that as an aspiration. Indeed, we shall wish to explore in Committee how far the proposals are likely to achieve that purpose. We shall wish to explore how far siphoning off some of the ablest law students into large law firms will extend the choice of advocates for lay clients—particularly if those firms are multi-disciplinary ones—and how far pressures on the high street solicitor, about which we have heard from the right hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale, will maximise the choice available to house buyers.

However, even as an ambition, this is subject to two qualifications—I say that in all friendship to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). First, not all measures for the protection of consumers consist in maximising their freedom of choice. The purpose of food hygiene regulations is to restrict consumers' freedom of choice to those foods guaranteed not to poison them. It is important that the range of consumer choice should be restricted to those capable of doing a proper job. It is tempting for someone in the process of buying a house to leap at the prospect of a single-stop package to include finding the house, arranging the mortgage, providing the insurance and carrying out the conveyancing, particularly if it seems that some of those services will be offered at cut rates. Sometimes, consumers are better protected by eliminating some of the options.

Secondly, in the sphere of litigation it is not invariably true that the interests of the consumer coincide with the public interest. The interests of an unmeritorious plaintiff or a guilty defendant consist of winning the case at all costs. The interests of justice require that the consumer's choice does not extend to those prepared to bend the rules in order to win.

I recognise that the Attorney-General is subject to some constraints as a member of a Government who believe that the solution to almost every problem lies in a free market. But I am sure that even he, with his usual fairness, will agree that this sector of the free market has its limitations.

May I add an observation on a further theme which has sometimes intruded in debates in another place? When it has been suggested that a particular formal safeguard would be sensible, it has been asked, "Are you suggesting that a person is necessarily dishonest just because he is not subject to the disciplinary code of the Law Society or the general council of the Bar? Do you believe that because someone may owe a loyalty to those who employ him, he is incapable of giving objective advice? Are you saying that because someone does not have a professional qualification, it follows that he is a jabbering idiot?" It is easy to ask that sort of question, and it can be asked in the right context to great effect. Of course, the answer in every case is no, but because people may be honest in the absence of regulation and capable in the absence of qualifications, it does not follow that all formal regulations are a waste of time. Even in the absence of a cab rank principle, an eccentric, an exponent of an unpopular cause or someone accused of a vile criminal offence may find a capable advocate to argue his cause. But, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said, it is much easier for an individual advocate to do the right thing if there is such a rule, partly because it creates an atmosphere, a general expectation that he will behave properly, and partly because it is much more difficult for anyone to misunderstand his motives.

I am not an unqualified admirer of Thomas Hobbes; it does not follow that in the absence of institutional safeguards everyone will behave like a brute, but such safeguards add a bit of stiffening to the social constraints that we sometimes all need if original sin is not to take over.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that discussion so far has centred on the rights of professional bodies, but that it should centre on the rights of the individual, the protection of the public and ensuring that they are given the best possible services?

Mr. Archer: I cannot always reply to my hon. Friend with an unqualified affirmative, but on this occasion I have no qualifications to add to what he said.

It is a pity that, with the machinery of law reform now at our disposal, the Government did not initiate a wider discussion and, in particular, did not provide more time for bodies, which themselves needed to carry out wide consultation, to respond to some of the proposals. It might have helped if the Government had begun by seeking a consensus on what is wrong with the legal system. What are the complaints of those who use legal services? I believe that any such consensus would have identified two major areas of complaint. The first would have been that referred to by my right hon. and learned Friend—about hearing dates in the county courts, unanswered letters, under-provision for continuous hearings, unrealistic lists and sharing clerks in the Crown court. Anyone told that the answer to those problems was to transfer more work to the county court could then at least have judged the proposal in the light.

The other area in which there would almost certainly have been consensus was also referred to by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon—the provision of legal aid. The last speech that I was privileged to make from the Dispatch Box in 1979 was to introduce the Legal Aid Bill of my late right hon. and learned Friend Lord Elwyn Jones. I am sure we all agree that his absence from our debates on this Bill is much to be regretted.

The Legal Aid Act 1979 brought between 70 per cent. and 80 per cent. of the population within the ambit of legal aid. After all the statistical sophistries to which we have been subjected over the past two years, as my right hon. and learned Friend said, it is now generally accepted that that figure has fallen to about 50 per cent. We know that in whole areas of litigation legally aided representation is not available, and that levels of remuneration and delays in payment are persuading increasing numbers of firms of solicitors to refuse to offer—because they feel unable to—a service to those who depend on legal aid.

A further problem is becoming increasingly apparent. There were references in another place to those who have the resources to finance a moderate action, including perhaps a day in the High Court, but who would be bankrupted if they had to pay for a long hearing or a series of appeals. If justice is to be available to all, including the middle-income groups, we need to replace the present cut-off point with a sliding scale, so that everyone may have access to legal aid if confronted by actions that are beyond his means.

The Society of Labour Lawyers has persuaded the Labour party that there is a need to take a much wider look at the network of advisory services, to ensure that proper arrangements are made for referrals within the system, and to seek out those geographical areas where some essential services are missing. We need an advisory services commission to oversee the present shambles which is spread out across seven Government Departments. Such proposals are referred to in the response of the Society of Labour Lawyers to the Green Paper—a response that I commend to the Attorney-General.

Both in the courts service and in the provision of legal services there is a need for a more substantial commitment of public resources. In the absence of that, the proposals in the Bill are pointless. Given that, some of them deal with problems that will have ceased to exist. There is, for instance, no need to embark on contingency fees if we have the resources to provide legal aid and representation. It is easy to ask for more money; it is just as easy to reply that one does not solve a problem by throwing money at it. We have heard that antiphon many times, but it is certain that the problems of our courts and legal services are those of inadequate resources.

If we want a legal system that will continue to receive compliments from America and commendations from foreign lawyers, we shall have to pay for it at the going price. We are conning the public if we pretend that our debates on this Bill are a substitute for that.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Anyone happening to drop by the Chamber and being privileged to hear my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General opening the case for the Bill would have been forgiven for thinking that nothing very important was happening here this afternoon, except for some very good and sensible improvements to the legal system. Such is the consummate skill of my right hon. and learned Friend as an advocate that he has persuaded himself that the Bill is universally good and universally welcomed and that anyone attempting to criticise it subjects himself to an inheritance of damnation.

I wish that that were so, but the casual listener would have been shocked to discover the immense opposition and heat that the legislation has engendered. He would, for example, be shocked to realise that the major element of the Bill was considered by the Benson royal commission in 1979. In 1983, this very Government said that it was not necessary to give solicitors the right of audience in the higher courts; in 1985, they repeated that assertion; and in 1987 they repeated it again. Yet overnight, with no change in the circumstances of our legal system, this Bill has introduced precisely such a change.

The casual observer would also be shocked to know of the packed meetings of barristers and solicitors up and down the country, of the hours of vituperative though often brilliant speeches and debates in the other place, and of the hours of negotiation, discussion and amendment behind the scenes.

Why has this happened? It is because it is widely feared that the Bill, even in amended form, will be the beginning of the end of the independent Bar and of the separate branches of the legal profession, which have been among the greatest protectors of the liberties of the individual in our free society, which continues to be admired the world over—and envied in many countries.

I declare an interest as a practising barrister—when my political duties allow—but I want to make one point clear: contrary to what is apparently thought about the opposition to the Bill from the Bar, members of the Bar have little self-interest in opposing the Bill. Certainly, the strong objections of the Law Lords have nothing to do with self-interest. The Law Lords have no career structure to maintain which might be threatened by the Bill and no financial advantage from opposing it—their interest is purely the good of society. Most barristers would be financially much better off if the Bill were passed. I have no doubt that I would be better off both as a Member of Parliament and, in the unlikely event of my leaving this place at the next election, if I were to become a full-time solicitor advocate. So let us hear no more ill-informed nonsense of the kind that has led some Members to say that lawyers were bound to oppose the Bill anyway. If self-interest only were at stake, the Bar would support the Bill.

The Government's intention in the Bill is wholly excellent. It is to improve access to justice for all who need it by making the court system simpler, more efficient and quicker and by providing sufficient legal services to meet clients' needs. That is terrific—everyone can sit back and admire the intention. The trouble with the Bill is not simply that it cannot and will not attain that intention, but that many of its provisions will achieve the very opposite.

Almost the entire legal profession, which at least enjoys the advantage of knowing how the legal system in England and Wales works, fails to understand how this of all Governments can believe that if solicitors in villages and small towns—71 per cent. of solicitors operate in firms of four or fewer partners—have their conveyancing bread and butter taken from them and are thus driven to practise in larger towns and cities, that will somehow make their services more available to ordinary people. Ordinary people will have to get into trains, taxis and cars, travel to the big towns and cities and go to the new big firms of solicitors which will charge people immense sums for the minor items of advice which formerly they could have received in the local solicitor's small practice. This is because the operating overheads of large city firms will be substantial. It is manifest nonsense to assume that such a step will provide ordinary people with greater access to legal services.

It is impossible for many of us to understand how it can be an advantage to make the Bar wither away and encourage every young lawyer to become a solicitor. Youngsters leaving university will be given the choice. If they want to become a barrister, they will have to spend some time earning little or nothing and at the end of the day they will compete in the market for jobs all over the country, which they may or may not want to do. The work will come in dribs and drabs and most of it, particularly in the criminal sector, will be legally aided and therefore without substantial remuneration. Work has been done on the average income of members of the Bar and it is much lower than is generally believed. On the other hand, the youngsters may become solicitor advocates with the right of audience in the higher courts and the right to become a Queen's Counsel and a High Court judge, just like barristers. They will have a roof over their heads, constant work, a car, a pension and holidays with pay. Few university graduates will choose the uncertain career of the Bar in preference to the far more secure and certain career of solicitor. After a time, fewer people will go to the Bar, nearly all graduates will become solicitors and the Bar will wither away.

Solicitors cost much more than barristers. That is why in the courts in which solicitors may now operate they often prefer to use barristers, because they are cheaper. The Crown prosecution service in London has to pay twice as much for a solicitor as for a barrister to do a day's work. It is difficult to see how anybody can believe that the provisions in the Bill and the withering away of the Bar will make legal services cheaper. That is yet another manifest nonsense.

Nor do the majority of the legal profession see how the introduction of the win-at-all-costs philosophy, which means that one may not be paid much or at all if one loses a case, as half the litigants in our courts usually do, will as though by magic improve the quality of justice in our courts. We do not have that incentive to win now, so there is a greater belief in the integrity of our lawyers, and justifiably so, than if we had the American system where winning is important if one is to be paid. That is not just nonsense, but dangerous nonsense.

The three objections to the fundamental concepts of the Bill are therefore that it will make justice more and not less expensive, that it will make legal services less and not more available to consumers lower down the income scale, and that it will diminish the quality of justice itself. It will do those things not because they are in the consumer's interest, nor because there has been an enormous increase in public demand for those changes, but because some bureaucrats, politicians and perhaps some lawyers from another planet simply do not understand the legal system in England and Wales because they have neither knowledge nor experience of it.

Obviously, some things are wrong with the legal system, and the Government's Green Papers have put a good deal of momentum behind some of the changes. The Bar has produced an excellent response to the Green Papers. Considerable changes have been made and my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has acknowledged and commended them. That has been a positive result of all of this.

Let us face up to the true facts and not pretend in order to justify some diversionary, tactical changes, about what consumers find wrong with the legal system. It is not that they do not get enough legal aid or legal aid for enough legal actions and that they therefore do not have enough access to the courts. The Government would have to spend much more money to satisfy that demand. Will they do so? They will not. I do not pretend that I am in favour of the Government spending massively more money, but ordinary people complain about the need for more money for more legal services, not about the matters provided for in the Bill. Next they complain that they have to wait too long for their cases to come to court. We need more computerisation, more judges, more courts and more court staff if we are to satisfy that demand, which will cost much more money. Again, some may want the same lawyer always to be available for their case, but that costs much more money because the lawyer has to be paid to be out of court for the days or weeks until the case appears in the list. It is therefore difficult to believe that the genuine anxieties of the British people about the deficiencies of our legal system come down to anything other than money, genuine efficiency and the improvement of the court system. It is difficult to think of any major improvement in our legal system that the British people feel is necessary which the Bill will achieve, and we should be wrong to pretend otherwise.

The Bill is to some extent different from the original one and the Green Papers. We must recognise that and thank the Lord Chancellor for listening because that is precisely what he did. For that reason, certain crazy ideas—such as the certified advocate becoming more qualified the more flying hours he had clocked up—have gone out of the window. We must thank their Lordships for at least one important and necessary improvement which has been much welcomed in the House today—the insertion of the cab rank principle into the Bill for solicitor advocates—and we must thank the Government for their wise acceptance of that amendment. One of the main contributions of the Bar to the efficiency and availability of legal services is the cab rank principle. Just as the customer can pick any taxi cab from the cab rank, so any defendant or plaintiff, however mean and rotten his cause, can book the services of any barrister who may be available. Marshall Hall himself was available to defendants all over the country, and the same principle holds true today even if all that a defendant can offer is a measly legal aid fee.

As with the taxi driver, the experienced barrister knows the quickest, most efficient and, therefore, the cheapest way to his client's destination and, as with the taxi cab rank, the client usually does not have to wait so long for his case to arrive in court as he would if there were no taxi rank. That is why it is so important that that principle be maintained for all to whom it now applies, particularly the advocate in the higher courts, and I am pleased that there will be no question of removing the principle from the Bill before it becomes law.

Of course, that will be a burden for solicitor advocates who might prefer, for example, to go on taking work from insurance companies at fees which are much higher than legal aid fees, but, as the Opposition spokesman in the other place, Lord Mischcon, himself a most distinguished solicitor, and others on the Opposition Benches today have said, those who acquire the privileges of advocacy rights should be required to undertake the burdens and obligations which go with them and, I would add, particularly when the consumer will benefit.

Some years ago my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor described the cab rank rule as an important constitutional right. Nothing has changed. It still is, and he has recognised it as such.

Even with that addition to the Bill retained, however, there is still too much wrong with the Bill. I give some examples. First, if a high street financial institution—the bank or the building society—needs to lend money for the purchase of houses to stay in business, what kind of objective legal advice about buying a house will the customer really be given by the in-house solicitor? Complicated and expensive bureaucratic safeguards can be built in until the cows come home, but we cannot avoid the conclusion that such legal advice will not be independent and may not be disinterested.

Secondly, by all means let us transfer work from the High Court to the county court, but first let us ensure that the county courts have enough slack and surplus capacity to deal with that work. What do we have today? The figures have been given by one hon. Member after another. We have overworked county courts, staff changes and shortages on an unbelievable scale, awful cramped buildings and inadequate back-up facilities. Since many county court and circuit judges do High Court work anyway, by all means let us bring litigants to local courts and not to London, but funds will first have to be made available to stop them being overworked and understaffed. What undertaking can my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General give that such finance will be forthcoming? Without it, what on earth is the point of the change?

Thirdly, multi-disciplinary partnerships create another problem. This is an incomprehensible element of the Bill. What independent advice will a solicitor be able to give to a client who needs to sue a firm of accountants which has let him down badly if his solicitor is a partner in the accountancy firm? It is nonsense.

Fourthly, under the Bill, incredible as it may sound —we are talking about the Bill being welcomed by ordinary people—a person with no legal qualifications at all will have the right to practise in any court and, once he has that right, to become a judge in any court, and even to become a Lord of Appeal. Under the Bill, a person with no legal qualifications can become a Lord of Appeal and lay down the laws of the land. That is manifest nonsense.

Fifthly, the legislation's main intention was to break the monopoly of the Bar to conduct cases in the higher courts and to allow solicitors to be appointed as High Court judges. Although few institutions are as competitive as the Bar, it was thought that more competition was required. But solicitors can already become High Court judges—all that they have to do is to become barristers, so no great legislation or expensive bureaucracy is necessary if that end is desired. It is now easy for a solicitor to become a barrister. If solicitors want the right of audience in the higher court, they can become barristers. That is much easier than it was in the past.

If further changes are considered so necessary, it could all be done cheaply and efficiently, without expensive bureaucracy and costly administration, if senior judges were allowed to consider the qualification of advocates and to grant rights of audience subject to the cab rank principle. Why is it necessary to have this complicated, bureaucratic and expensive machinery, with clauses 17 to 31 and schedules 1 to 4 laying down the process by which all that has to be done?

If we have that kind of money to spare, why on earth are we not spending it on improving the courts or extending legal aid? I could go on, as the House well knows it is within my power to do, to dwell on the many unsatisfactory aspects of the Bill, but others wish to speak.

I appreciate that the opportunity of the Bill has been taken to make a number of improvements in the courts and legal services and I accept those without taking time to enumerate them. Sadly, however, the Bill may well be the beginning of the end of the Bar as we know it, and a fused profession, which nobody on either side wants—solicitors, barristers or the public—will be the inevitable conclusion of these unnecessary labours.

I realise that such is the unpopularity of the lawyer—ranking only marginally higher than that of the journalist and politician—that there is little likelihood that this unhappy, unfortunate, unnecessary and expensive Bill will not get its Second Reading, so our only hope will be to improve it. If, during the Bill's passage through the House, I am fortunate enough to be invited to participate in the Standing Committee proceedings, I hope that I shall be able to play some small part in making those improvements.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not the responsibility of hon. Members who are now in the Chamber that we had a rather late start to the debate, but at this rate all those hon. Members who wish to speak will not be called. I ask hon. Members to ensure that their speeches are not over-long so that as many as possible may be called.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): First, I declare an interest as joint secretary of the all-party barristers' group of both Houses and, more particularly, as a practising barrister for nearly 20 years. I mention that not only to declare my interest but also to try to lay a myth, which exists particularly at the Department of Trade and Industry and in certain quarters of the House, about the Bar.

It is nearly 19 years ago that I entered, as a tenant, the set of provincial chambers where I practised for some years. I had no prior connection with the legal profession and I was lucky to be accepted there. When I entered those chambers, the overheads were kept at a low level. I was given one eighth—there were eight of us in the chambers —of a piece of paper on which my head of chambers had written that my chamber expenses for that year would be £127. Thus I started my career at the Bar.

As a member of the Bar in those chambers, I was not subjected to any sort of hierarchy. I was fortunate to be outside any hierarchical structure, because it meant that, if solicitors chose to send me cases which appeared to be beyond my years, I was permitted to do them.

Thus, in Department of Trade and Industry terms, the Bar is the ideal profession. It is entirely market-oriented. Every barrister works for him or herself. They are eventually paid, often by recalcitrant solicitors and sometimes many years in arrears. I was recently paid £4·50 for drafting a divorce petition some 12 years earlier. Our overheads have kept at a low level throughout the years.

It helps if one's father, or even one's grandfather, was the Lord Chancellor; it helps even more if one's father is the senior partner in a busy firm of solicitors with lots of litigation. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the Bar is an extremely egalitarian profession—as a procession of Lord Chancellors over the years serves to prove, if one examines their backgrounds. I am proud to be a member of such a profession.

I accept the need, as do all sensible barristers, to cut away unnecessary undergrowth from the profession. It is in the interests of lawyers to modernise their profession —and if they do not do so themselves, they can only expect others to do it for them. The question which must be asked is whether the Government have approached this matter in the right way; the answer, as one would expect, is partly yes and partly no.

The Bill's legitimacy depends on two criteria. First, and above all, it must seek to improve the position of the consumer. Secondly, it must not weaken the independence of the judge or lawyer, for to do so would weaken the position of the client, to allow challenges to be made against decisions of the Executive; where necessary, of the police; of local government; and of the increasing number of bodies in which are vested significant resources of power over the citizen.

In the context of those criteria, I should like to raise a great many points. However, accepting the constraints of time, I propose to address only four issues of major concern. If I am fortunate—or unfortunate—enough to serve on the Committee considering the Bill, I foresee a great many more issues which will require detailed debate.

The first issue is the ready access by the citizen to the courts and tribunals of the land when the occasion arises. That means having ready access not only to the courts themselves but also to competent advice from which he can gain confidence in deciding whether or not to go to court. The Bill merely touches the edges of that problem. I acknowledge that the Government have invested more money in the legal aid system, and I welcome the current review to which the Attorney-General referred when opening this debate. However, it is fair to point out—as did the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris)—that an increasing proportion of the population falls outside the limits of legal aid, which are too low and too selective.

Every monthly increase in inflation means that a smaller percentage of the public is eligible for legal aid. Far too many people have experienced wrongs that should have been righted, but they cannot afford to go to law, despite the fact, which should be put on the record, that the cost of litigation in England and Wales—I cannot speak for Scotland—compares reasonably favourably with anywhere else in the European Community, and makes us seem like a bargain basement by comparison with even some of the remoter jurisdictions of the United States of America.

The Bill and the Government's motives would be more convincing if they were accompanied by an immediate widening of certain aspects of the legal aid net. There are obvious gaps in legal aid that do not require a review before introducing remedies. I listened with care to what the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon said about tribunals. I believe that he agrees—though his remarks were a little impenetrable—that legal aid should be extended immediately to industrial tribunals. The last Labour Government took the deliberate and shameful decision to exclude it. That decision was not taken on the merits of the case but in response to the disgraceful bleatings of a few trade union leaders, who thought that their membership figures might drop if legal aid were available for industrial tribunals. That omission should be put right, and I do not have confidence in waiting for a Labour Government to do so because I am not convinced that they would. After all, Labour had plenty of opportunity to introduce such a provision before.

Consumer access to justice depends also on judges and courts being available to hear cases that cannot be settled out of court. I welcome the commitment to take many cases out of the High Court, whose sittings—despite significant improvements in recent years—are delayed and whose places of jurisdiction are often many miles from the scene of a legal dispute. I welcome the decision to bring many disputes down to the county court. The civil justice review has much to commend it—at least in concept.

The county court is intended as a local and, above all, as a summary court. As such, it should provide reliable, speedy justice. It has often been said that justice delayed is justice denied. The aim of the county court is to provide justice while events are still fresh in the memories of witnesses. Unfortunately, delays in some county courts have reached absurd proportions.

Loyal county court staff around the country have expressed to me their extreme frustration at the ridiculous amount of work that they are required to undertake, in a way that sometimes subjects them to abuse from the public —who do not understand the difficulties under which court staff have to work. The Government have made a commitment to provide extra resources to ease the transition through the civil justice review, but their commitment is far less than that needed to make the review work.

Over the past 11 years, county courts and Crown court offices have faced successive staff inspections pursuant to Government economic policies and designed to cut staffing —which is what happened. An entirely opposite approach will be needed to ensure that the review works. I hope that the Government will give an assurance that whatever resources are required to make it a success will be available —even if they amount to a great deal more than is currently anticipated. We do not want to see the Crown prosecution service fiasco happen all over again with the civil justice review. We do not want the Attorney-General coming to the House, as he did recently, to admit that initial resourcing—as in the case of the CPS—was insufficient.

Another important aspect concerns the cab rank rule, or what the Attorney-General called the non-discrimination rule. I welcome the Government's acceptance that that principle should be enshrined in the Bill. It will benefit the consumer, but it offers no advantage to the lawyer, as was emphasised by the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). It is much better to pick the best-paid case, but the cab rank rule means that the lawyer will have to undertake the case that comes in first.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Tell us another one.

Mr. Carlile: I say to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—whom we would have allowed to enter our chambers despite his lack of qualifications, and who would have benefited from some training in interview techniques in the early part of his career—that there is very little evidence of abuse of the cab rank rule, other than anecdote. The Bar regards breaches of that rule as a serious disciplinary offence, and if the hon. Gentleman has evidence that people have broken it, he should report them.

Mr. Mitchell: There is an enormous weight of anecdotal evidence, but to impose it on solicitor advocates is a restriction of trade and an attempt to maintain the monopoly of the Bar.

Mr. Carlile: Since the hon. Gentleman became a television star, he has abandoned his attachment to the consumer.

I made an important point during my intervention in the Attorney-General's speech, and I shall make it again: the Government must accept that the rule against discrimination should apply to legally aided clients.

Advocates must be required to represent clients within their areas of competence, whether they are privately paying or legally aided; otherwise, the rule will not apply on a level playing field and the consumer will not benefit from it.

Thirdly, the independence of judges, lawyers and regulators of the profession is single and indivisible. There are serious objections to the Bill in its present form, which threatens that independence. Inevitably, the Bill politicises the appointment of the designated judges. It ducks out of a radical and much more clearly understandable approach to the appointment of judges, such as the establishment of a judicial appointments commission. Worst of all, it creates a politically appointed advisory committee—another politically appointed committee, subject to all the problems of patronage. Thus it brings into the political arena the rules of conduct applied to practitioners—something that should be abhorrent to those committed to independence among lawyers.

It is extremely surprising to see a Conservative Government seeking a power with such a dangerous potential for misuse in perhaps less happy future times. There is no significant evidence that either the Law Society or the Bar has failed to modernise its professional codes; indeed, the Bar's revised code of conduct is a model of progressive thinking and adjustment to the modern age.

Another aspect of independence needs to be highlighted and protected—the independence of the advocate from undue influence or involvement. Of course the advocate should be involved, even devoted—in the professional sense—to the client's case. However, the scope for mistakes—and much worse than mistakes—is narrowed significantly if the advocate is not the person who interviews witnesses prior to conducting a trial, especially a serious trial in the criminal courts.

It is equally valuable for those who prosecute serious cases to have considerable experience of defence work to secure the objectivity that is necessary if justice is to be done. One of the most difficult decisions that a prosecutor makes is to abandon the prosecution—to offer no evidence. It is the experience of defending cases—perhaps as many as he prosecutes—that enables an advocate to make that decision more correctly and skilfully.

Finally, let me deal with local legal services. In my large rural Welsh constituency, there are firms of solicitors operating in Guilsfield—my predecessor as Member for Montgomery practises there—in Welshpool, Newtown, Llanidloes, Llanfyllin and Machynlleth. I doubt whether real intellectual justification can be found for the privileged position of solicitors if conveyancing is seen as an isolated activity or skill.

However, there seem to be two sound if pragmatic reasons for retaining much of the present position. First, there is the great pressure that financial institutions and some estate agents are likely to impose on financially innocent home buyers. An independent voice is essential in what is the largest transaction in most people's lives. Secondly, local legal services in the form of solicitors—for example, in the places that I have mentioned—are heavily dependent upon, and in reality subsidised by, conveyancing.

Those firms in such areas as Llanfyllin and Machynlleth will not be compensated by rights of audience; that is the last thing that they want. They like to obtain expert advice from counsel in chambers elsewhere, and would be embarrassed by their clients asking them to appear for them in the Crown court or the High Court.

If conveyancing goes, large numbers of small firms of solicitors are likely to go to the wall. At best, they are likely to be subsumed in much larger firms, with a smaller fund of local knowledge and a consequent reduction in choice. As any practising solicitor in the House knows, local knowledge is crucial in negotiating the settlement of local disputes. People will become more litigious if a solicitor comes in from a city elsewhere and merely advises them on the legal issue under consideration, without having regard to local conditions. The Government have not addressed that problem adequately.

The Committee stage promises to be a lively affair. We hope for considerable improvement in the Bill, which has the right to go to Committee: and I shall vote for that if necessary, and advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to do the same. With my mind closely on the two criteria that I cited at the beginning of my remarks, I shall see how the Bill looks in relation to those criteria after its Committee stage. They will be our litmus test; I hope that the Bill will pass that test.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): I must declare some interests. First, I am chairman of the Lords and Commons solicitors group. Secondly, I have held a solicitor's practising certificate for 40 years—although for the past 15 of those years the demands of the House have obliged me to retire from active practice, perhaps enabling me to take a detached view of these matters. Thirdly, I am the chairman of the London board of a building society, a position that some might consider could give rise to a conflict of interest with some provisions of the Bill, but which helps me to consider the matter objectively.

The House will not be surprised if I do not follow many of the right hon. and hon. Members who have already spoken, as all but one have represented the Bar. There is a contrary view for the House to consider. The Bill is clearly in the mainstream of the Government's desire to tackle restrictive practices—a policy that has brought immense benefits to our economy and to the consumer. The professions—especially the legal profession—cannot stand aloof from that, nor has the legal profession done so. Scarcely a firm of solicitors has not either merged with others or considered merging; they are evaluating themselves and planning their futures in the way that efficient enterprises do. With the restrictions on advertising and marketing gone, firms can now direct themselves towards the markets in which they plan to expand.

In central London, the legal community serves the private client—more particularly, the corporate or commercial client—better than ever before, not only by our standards but by international standards. London is now recognised as the legal centre for Europe. Where else can a team of specialists in banking, shipping, aviation, insurance, financial futures or mergers and acquisitions be put together within hours, ready for a major international transaction? That could happen in New York, but nowhere else in Europe. Our legal firms in London and our other major cities are now the envy of nearly every other country in Europe. Our firms are poised to take full advantage of the European internal market, with the Law Society's 1992 awareness campaign leading the way.

[Sir Hugh Rossi]

Of course, those firms are not representative of the whole profession. There are 55,000 practising solicitors in offices throughout the country. There is scarcely a high street in any town that does not have a sole practitioner or a two or three-partner firm, affording a network of accessibility to the legal processes and to justice. Speaker after speaker has recognised that that should not be undermined or destroyed. If the Bill unfortunately does that, it will be a sad day for this country and its people.

While solicitors can be proud of their response to the spur of competition given by the Government, they are also proud of the solid foundation on which they rest, especially the consumer protection afforded by the regulatory system that we have inherited, in Solicitors Act after Solicitors Act, laying down the responsibilities that the profession has willingly adopted and accepted in self-regulation through the Law Society.

A client dealing with a solicitors' firm can do so with confidence, knowing that that firm is insured up to £1 million for every claim that may be made against it. Clients' money is underwritten by unlimited compensation. Nowhere else in the country does anyone offer that sort of protection to the consumer. We need only to contrast it with the financial services industry, where there is no overall insurance system. Indeed, FIMBRA came near to collapse over the proposal to institute one. If a client's money is missing, he has to await bankruptcy proceedings before he can get a penny, and then the most that he can expect is £48,000, regardless of the size of his loss.

The profession values, and attaches the greatest importance to, its independence and its ability to give impartial advice without fear or favour. The advice given by a lawyer who one suspects does not understand one's interest or is not fully committed to one's representation is virtually valueless. However, independence of mind, independence to give impartial advice, cannot be bought at the snap of a finger. Professional independence is underpinned by a tradition and a code of ethics that are regularly upheld. By the same token, that independence can be easily undermined. In the solicitors' profession, it is maintained by ensuring that only solicitors bound by the same code of ethics own the firms that employ solicitors who offer services to the general public. In the protection of the public, proper regulation and the profession's independence are linked.

As has already been implied by a number of right hon. and hon. Members, at the end of the day the independence of the legal profession is the bulwark against too great an encroachment by the state upon the lives of individuals. That is why I questioned the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) when he suggested control over the judiciary by this House. God forbid that politicians ever influence or affect the judicial independence of our courts. I hope that that is not the way that the Labour party wants to lead us.

I must refer to the Bar and the need for it to maintain its traditional independence. Solicitors have good and warm personal relations with members of the Bar. However, if the divided profession works in practice, it cannot be said to be based on a secure, modern foundation. While the solicitors' profession has adapted and modernised itself, the Bar collectively often gives the appearance, if not necessarily the substance, of being rooted in the past. Its monopoly of business in the higher courts and its resultant hold on all senior judicial appointments could, for the most part, be retained by common consent if the Bar did not persist in demanding a legal monopoly.

I do not believe, and nor does any solicitor whom I know, that the giving of audience to a specially trained and qualified solicitor in the High Court would destroy or cripple the Bar. That has certainly not been the case in Australia or New Zealand. I do not believe that the right of audience in the lower courts has adversely affected the Bar to any extent. I am sure that only a minority of the 55,000 solicitors will wish to have the right of audience to the High Court and then it will be mainly for clients with whom they have developed a special relationship. The vast majority of solicitors—the general practitioners of the profession—would still need the specialisation offered by the Bar. The partners of the large City practices involved in mergers with international companies could not afford the time to be tied down in court, away from their desks and telephones.

It is in that context that we welcome the Lord Chancellor's brave attempt in the Green Paper to set out a framework for reform. He had to withstand a withering, sustained and almost personal campaign from those opposed to reform. That campaign is far from over, as is clear to anyone who has followed the proceedings of the Bill in another place.

What was his proposal on the reform of the profession? It was that solicitors and barristers should undergo further training after initial qualification and before exercising the rights of audience to the higher courts. To the credit of the Law Society, it accepted that a level playing field was not appropriate and that it was not necessary to require barristers to undergo further training. Nevertheless, it accepted the need for solicitors to have that training. That was a major concession, which has enabled the Government to introduce reforms in a much more simplified form than originally envisaged. The Law Society should be given full credit for that.

The latest—and, I hope, the final—manifestation of the campaign by those opposed to reform was the amendment, carried in another place—proposed and supported by the Bar and the judges, against the advice of the Lord Chancellor—to impose what has already been referred to by member of the Bar after member of the Bar in this House as the cab rank rule on solicitors wishing to exercise the rights of audience in the higher courts. We shall study carefully what my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General said in opening the debate. We shall have to consider carefully the amendment that he proposes to put down. If I understood him correctly, he said that the Law Society was reconciled to the cab rank rule. If that is the case, then he is mistaken. That is not so.

The Law Society understands and would wish to participate in a system whereby there is no discrimination against an individual wishing to have access to justice, but that is entirely different from the cab rank rule as practised by the Bar. Whatever the merits that rule may have for the Bar, it is entirely another matter for the solicitors' profession. Barristers take work on referral only. That is part of their terms of business. They accept cases in their field of practice, and that helps to spread the work around for the benefit of the Bar in general and for newly called members in particular. The rule also provides useful protection for advocates who can rightly claim that it is not necessary for them personally to be associated with the cause that they advocate in the courts.

However, I do not say that that means that every barrister has to take on every case that is put in front of him. There is a rule of the Bar which states, if I remember the wording roughly, that no member is obliged to take on any work for a fee which is inadequate in his view having regard to the complexity of the matter and to his knowledge, experience and standing. If that is not a coach and horses through the so-called cab rank rule, I should like to know what is.

I shall give the House some anecdotal evidence. In my younger days I experienced great difficulty in negotiating fees with counsel's clerks, or securing the man I wanted for my client, because of that rule or something similar. No cab rank rule was applied in those cases. I cannot bring those papers before the House now, as they are more than 20 years old, but they are engraven on my memory as a young solicitor trying to represent clients through the courts. [Interruption.] Paragraph 502 of the barrister's code of conduct stipulates what I have just recited. Therefore, let us not have so much of this holier-than-thou attitude that member of the Bar after member of the Bar has entertained the House with.

By large, solicitors do not operate on referral and the cab rank rule would be an unacceptable imposition. Some solicitors have built up practices by specialising in particular fields of work. In doing so, they have had to decline to represent certain classes of defendant. For example, some provide a service by specialising in housing work on behalf of tenants, and others have built up a relationship of trust with rape crisis centres. The business of those firms would be endangered, and the sensitive relationship between solicitor and client undermined if they—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] Members of the Bar are talking who have no experience of running a solicitor's office.

In some parts of London, to accept a landlord as a client would make it difficult for a firm to build on its reputation of representing tenants' interests. Similarly, to represent a defendant in a rape case is considered by firms which work closely with rape crisis centres as something that would cause problems for them, and would make it more difficult for their clients to accept that the firm is on their side and would do the best for them.

The House has to bear in mind the fact that the Bar, which is always one step removed, has the solicitor as a buffer between the client and himself or herself, and it can afford to take a more detached view of the way in which it approaches the lay client, in a way that the solicitor cannot. If the cab rank rule, in its present form, proceeds, it would also prevent solicitors from offering advocacy simply as an additional service to existing clients, rather than to the world at large.

Why should solicitors not be able to offer advocacy to existing clients? I should have thought that that would be in the interests of the consumer. Most solicitor advocates would not wish to be committed to advocacy all the time. If they did, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) suggested, they could join the Bar. They want to stay solicitors and they want to give a better service to clients. Why introduce into another situation a rule that is appropriate to the Bar?

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Gentleman will remember that I have been both a solicitor and a barrister. If one has 1,000 cases a year, all of which require Crown court advocacy, which one does the solicitor advocate choose to do? Will he not be picking and choosing the most juicy cases on his list? Is that not the danger, unless there is a cab rank rule?

Sir Hugh Rossi: That is a matter for his client. The client would insist that the solicitor represents him or her in court. They would say, "That is why we came to you, because we heard that you are very good at this and we want you to represent us." The solicitor cannot afford to have the word go round that he is refusing business. He would soon have little business.

Mr. Bermingham: That is not the case.

Sir Hugh Rossi: That is the case, and the hon. Gentleman knows it. Because a solicitor does not accept some work referred to him, that does not mean that those clients are without a remedy, because the Bar is still there. We are only saying that that right should exist in certain circumstances.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) may appreciate that, if he builds up a reputation as a solicitor advocate and his firm accepts the cab rank rule, down the road, some rivals may say to themselves, "This is a nasty vexatious litigant, who will drive everyone mad." They will recommend him to go to the hon. Member's firm. They will say, "He will look after you." The vexatious madman will come along and the hon. Gentleman will be stuck with him under the cab rank rule. At least solicitors act as a filter for members of the Bar in such situations.

The cab rank rule is neither necessary to ensure proper representation nor effective to ensure high quality representation. To impose it on solicitor advocates would unnecessarily obstruct the way in which solicitors could offer their services to the public. The Bar is well aware of that. The amendment was introduced in another place simply as a wrecking amendment, to ensure that solicitor advocates would not wish to exercise the right of audience in the High Court. That was the beginning and the end of this proposal. I hope that, when the Law Officers consider the amendment and bring forward their own form of wording, they will bear that carefully in mind.

Conveyancing has been a live subject since the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) introduced his private Member's Bill some seven years ago. The solicitors' profession did not react well at that time. Its reaction may well have helped the Bill on its way.

The Law Society did not accept the advice that hon. Members offered at that time, but it has reflected on it and it is not making the same mistake today. Whatever misgivings it may have about the results of the proposals, it does not seek to stand in the way of the Government's clear determination to allow institutions to provide conveyancing. It has confined itself to attempting to ensure that the safeguards necessary to protect clients are put in place. The mechanism that the Government now propose —a regulatory board—is an improvement on the previous proposal for a mix of regulatory authorities.

If house buyers have the right to choose between an institutional conveyancer and a solicitor in private practice, they will have to exercise much caution when making that choice. The massive advertising budgets of the major institutions will stimulate and create demand. The one, two or three-man solicitor practices cannot begin to compete with that. Let us hope that the motives of the institutions are as they say they are—simply to offer a conveyancing service for the convenience of their customers. Can we be sure that that is true?

The aim of the institutions may be to ensure that the house buyer, having been sold a mortgage and a life policy, does not realise that he has been oversold and does not need the expensive policies that he is proposing to take. Disturbing reports have recently appeared in the press of people being obliged to surrender their endowment policies on the advice of those selling them a house, offering them a mortgage and getting them to take on another endowment policy. The Institute of Insurance Consultants estimates that home buyers lose £680 million a year by unnecessarily surrendering endowment policies. We also know from those reports that agents do not always put forward the best offer to vendors because they will lose their commission if they do not persuade the vendor to do business with someone who is taking out an insurance policy through their agency.

Independent financial advice for householders is more important than ever before. It is interesting that my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling)—the only non-lawyer who has taken part in the debate—said that this was one of his greatest concerns. He gave a formula whereby the consumer could obtain independent advice on different insurance policies. But it does not end there, because modern thinking is that a mortgage could be better linked to an investment trust arrangement rather than to an endowment policy. Who will give that independent advice other than a solicitor who is streetwise and knows his way around the financial world and is in business simply to advise his client impartially?

If the result of the Bill is that fewer house buyers have their eyes opened about the commitments and investments that they are taking on, that will be a cause for concern. It will be a sorry day if the House eventually accepts a Bill that does exactly that.

I hope that the Bill will receive a fair wind on Second Reading. Much of it is long overdue and necessary, but there are some concerns which I hope the Law Officers will bear in mind in its final stages.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is the 10-minutes rule being applied today? Many hon. Members wish to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The 10-minutes rule is not being applied by Mr. Speaker today, but I repeat the appeal that he has made at least twice for shorter speeches; otherwise, many hon. Members will be disappointed.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I shall endeavour to respect your comments about short speeches, Mr. Deputy Speaker. For that reason, I shall not follow the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), although I shall deal with some of the points that he made.

Once upon a time, before the great Thatcherite revolution, which is supposedly encapsulated in this Bill and in many others that we have debated in the past 10 years, there were barristers and solicitors. Barristers argued cases in court and wore wigs. Solicitors sat at desks, interviewed witnesses, shuffled bits of paper and generally prepared the case. That was not the reality because barristers also sat at desks, wrote opinions and drafted pleadings, and some solicitors argued cases in court without wearing wigs.

That was the position before the Bill. Let us consider now what will happen when the Bill becomes law. As I read the Bill, there will be a great metamorphosis. Barristers will become advocates, and solicitors will become litigators. Advocates will still argue cases in court wearing wigs and will draft opinions and pleadings. In the main, litigators will still sit in offices and prepare cases and litigation.

The original attempt at a great revolution came up against the reality that there are two different functions —preparing a case for court and putting it to the court. Usually, barristers carry out one function and solicitors the other. One function is not superior to the other and the people who carry them out are not superior to one another. One is glad to see that those different functions appear in the Bill, because the public often think that employing a barrister and a solicitor is a conspiracy to extract more money from the populace and that it is some kind of restrictive practice for which there is no justification. We should commend the Government for the fact that in clauses 15 and 16 the Bill enshrines in statute for the first time the fact that there are two different functions—the function of advocacy and the function of the litigator.

What happens when the great Thatcherite revolution comes up against the reality that generally it is better for the advocate to be an independent contractor and not subject to a contract of employment or a partner in a firm? The result, as we have seen before, is that a new quango is set up. Quangos were set up following privatisation of the telephone and electricity industries and most other privatisation measures and here again—lo and behold—there is to be another quango. It is a very good quango with 14 members and a chairman. No doubt they will be worthy people; some will be barristers, some solicitors and others worthy lay people. We all know how the Government appoint quango members. They do not do as the Labour Government tried to do—they do not try to be even handed. We all know how lay members to quangos are appointed under this Government. If they are friends of the Government, they are appointed. If they are not, they do not have a chance.

What is the quango supposed to do? Schedule 2 tells us that it is meant to oversee legal education. We should all agree that that is a worthy objective. I have practised at the Bar on and off for the past 20 years, and one criticism of the Bar is that legal education does not provide the kind of training in advocacy that students should have before they sit their final exams. Years ago I lectured at the university of Chicago law school. I was very impressed with American law schools, although I accept that they are different institutions. In the American law schools, advocacy—training in the courts—counts towards the final examination marks. If the quango can improve legal education in that respect—I accept that there have been improvements over the past 10 years—nobody will object to that.

What else is the quango supposed to achieve? Somehow it has to try to resolve the Green Paper's original intention to do away with the so-called restrictive practices. However, that intention came up against reality. The quango is supposed to bridge the gap between the advocate and the solicitor who wants to be an advocate occasionally, as the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green put it so well. The quango must deal with the litigator who wants to do a little hobble as an advocate, but the Bill does not explain the criteria. I suppose that that is par for the course. This great Thatcherite Bill tells us nothing—everything is left to Ministers and to the quango.

As the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green said, what will happen to the litigator who does not want to advocate all the time, but who has an old and valued friend—perhaps a landlord—for whom he has been working for years and for whom he goes to court and does a case? Will he be able simply to walk into the court and put a wig on his head? What about the company lawyer who may have spent 30 years advising companies and who knows the theory of company law backwards? What if he decides to go to the companies court for an old and valued company? Can he simply drop into that court? Will he have to have a licence for that particular right of audience or will licences be granted to groups of solicitors?

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South) indicated dissent.

Mr. Davies: It is no use the Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg), shaking his head. The Solicitor-General should tell us what criteria will apply and how the licences will be granted. I do not object, but I should like to know how the process will operate. I should like to know whether a one-off application will be allowed or whether the litigator will have to prove a track record over a period or an intention to have such a track record.

The Attorney-General skated over the question of partnerships. I hold an old-fashioned view in that I believe that an advocate should not be a partner but should be a sole practitioner. I am not casting aspersions, but a partner is contractually bound to his fellow partners. He is almost a trustee in that there is almost a trust between partners. Should advocates enter into partnerships with other advocates? Should advocates enter into partnerships with litigators, and should litigator advocates be allowed to enter into partnerships with litigators? What happens in the multi-disciplinary partnerships which are now in vogue in the City and the west end?

I do not believe that litigator advocates should be partners with litigators. I understand that there are firms of solicitors which practise in the county courts where there are partners and I do not believe that that can be changed. However, I should like the quango to lay down rules so that if a litigator wants to become an advocate, that is fine, but that the litigator should not remain a partner with his fellow partners because that could lead to a conflict of interest between the partners, the courts and the clients. The position is even worse when one considers multi-disciplinary partnerships.

Let us suppose that a large firm of solicitors which specialises entirely in building and construction work decides to bring into partnership three or four surveyors who have worked for that firm in litigation over a considerable period. That would then be a multi-disciplinary partnership of litigators and surveyors. Let us suppose that one of the litigators wishes to become an advocate. The partnership would then comprise litigators, a litigator advocate and surveyors. A case may come before the High Court in which the expert witness is a surveyor partner, the case is presented by the litigator advocate partner and the case is prepared by the litigator partner. I do not believe that the Office of Fair Trading would believe that that was in the interests of the consumer and in the interests of justice or that it would lead to greater efficiency or lower costs. There are great dangers in allowing such partnerships. In Committee I hope that the Government will tell us more about their thinking in respect of partnerships and how they see the quango developing the rules for partnerships between different parts of the profession.

Everyone apart for the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green believes that the cab rank principle is a good thing. It has not worked perfectly and the rules are now being tightened. The answer is to tighten the rules again and apply them to all advocates and litigator advocates. It was ridiculous for the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green to argue the example of a firm of solicitors which specialises in landlord and tenant work and has always worked for landlords. He argued that, under the cab rank rule, that firm would have to work for tenants as well. That is an appalling and immoral attitude. Most solicitors would not agree with the hon. Gentlman. As David Napley pointed out in his article in The Times earlier this week, most solicitors would be happy to abide by the cab rank rule.

Sir Hugh Rossi: I had in mind particular firms which pride themselves on their Left-wing views. Some firms in London concentrate on representing the interests of the tenant and will not consider a landlord if one should cross their premises. We must consider whether we are prepared to force those firms to do what they do not want to do.

Mr. Davies: That is not a defensible argument if they wish to become litigator advocates. If they do not wish to do so, the problem does not arise. We are considering only those who wish to become litigator advocates, and the corollary of that is that they should accept the cab rank principle.

In principle, I welcome part I of the Bill and the civil justice review. I welcome the eventual transfer of cases to the county courts, if funds are available and legal aid is approved. It is extraordinary that 70 per cent. of Bar members practise in London. If we could have an efficient county court system and a transfer of power, that would be a very efficient devolution of power in terms of costs, but it will take time and it will need money.

Personal injury cases can now be transferred to the county court if the claim exceeds £5,000 and for claims up to £25,000 according to the intentions of the civil justice review. Very often those cases are very difficult and important because they affect human beings. It is important that funds should be available to the county courts to enable them to hear such cases properly and efficiently. I do not believe that the Bill will reduce costs or lead to more efficient justice, and it may endanger an independent Bar. The Government should state exactly how they intend to operate rules relating to applications for licences by those who are not barristers but who wish to become litigant advocates.

7.29 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): I hope that the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) will forgive me if I do not follow him directly, but hon. Members are coming under increasing pressure of time. However, I shall mention various matters to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. I hope that he will be grateful for that at least.

Hon. Members have begun their orations with a declaration of interest. We even heard the triumphant declaration, "I am not a lawyer," from my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling). I, too, must make a declaration of interest. At least it is unique in that I am the first of the hybrids who have been called to speak, although the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) has intervened briefly. For more than 15 years I was in active practice at the Bar. I am now a practising solicitor in so far as a solicitor can practise and be a Member of the House. I am proud to have a practising certificate. I think that I am the only hybrid who has gone from being a barrister to being a solicitor. Three Opposition Members have gone the other way. I hope that they are not frightened by my sudden presence in the midst of their former profession.

I assure my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) that I did not change over to go rushing off to set up an advocacy practice. I am only too relieved—this remark has more serious significance than a flippant comment—that I no longer need to run round keeping judges waiting as well as be a Member of this House. That comment applies to the vast number of people who have chosen, at whatever stage of their careers, to opt for the solicitors' side. One does not become a solicitor to become an advocate.

A further part of my declaration of interest is that, if the Committee of Selection so wills it, I hope that I shall serve on the Standing Committee and move various amendments on behalf of the Law Society, which I shall make plain when I move such amendments. Therefore, the pattern of this abbreviated speech is to set the scene for the information of Government Front-Bench Members and others of certain points that will be taken, some of which have been touched on in the debate.

We are a divided profession—that is accepted in the Bill. Various horror stories and images have been raised in previous discussions on this measure and have crept into our generally sensible discussions tonight. I have no doubt that the profession will remain divided, that it has worked well, that it is as good as other legal professions anywhere, and that its standards are of the highest. That applies to all elements of the profession. Therefore, it follows that the system should be changed only very carefully. The Bill does that. I do not regard it as an extreme measure nor, with all respect not only to hon. Members but to Members of the other place, as an insidious gateway to matters such as fusion of the profession. Nevertheless, the profession must react to modern needs. It cannot resist all change.

I spent a brief part of my Easter looking at some of the debates in the other place. Even in the calm serenity of the past few days, some judicial apoplexy seemed to occur in the otherwise sedate columns of Lords Hansard. It must be noted that some members of the judiciary and others went over the top in their initial reaction to the measure. As a barrister turned solicitor, I am most anxious that that does not happen in our debates and that we may be calm and constructive throughout our proceedings.

By no means does the Law Society like everything in the Bill, and various aspects of that dislike will come out subsequently. I like to think that hon. Members have been constructive and that we shall seek to improve the Bill in the national interest, not in a sectional interest. Hon. Members and members of the Bar are mutually and generally concerned with high professional standards and the preservation of those standards by the necessary long-established controls. That point was made most eloquently by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), a former Solicitor-General.

It is with pleasure that I note that this is not a party-line occasion. I hope that the two sides of the profession will come together on certain matters. Although we might get away from Government versus Opposition and vice versa attitudes, there is a danger that we might encounter solicitor versus barrister and vice versa attitudes. That would not be good for the overall outcome of the Bill when it leaves this place. Therefore, I expect some strange alliances in an effort to improve the Bill to the maximum.

There are some specific concerns about rights of audience. There has been a lot of fuss about very little. As I said earlier in jest, the vast majority of solicitors have no interest in professional advocacy. With experience of both sides of the profession, I have no doubt that the Bar, with its obvious skilled practice and tradition in this regard—that is, the fact that it practises on a regular basis, which is necessary in court work—will remain pre-eminent and necessary. The central point is that if, in maintaining those values, it makes itself out to be a bastion which in some way—with which I totally disagree—is so weak that it cannot survive without forms of privilege and what some would call restrictive practice, it will point the way to its own demise much quicker than anyone who has had anything to do with the Bill would have dreamt of.

One would obviously want to look at the role and power of designated judges under the schedule 4 procedure; those matters were examined in the other place and they will be discussed again. Their role has not, to say the least, been inactive. Whether it goes to the extent that the judiciary should have powers of actual decision rather than a more consultative and interpretative role is something that we shall wish to consider against whether it is for the legislature, the Executive or both whether hon. Members should have the power of decision and whether judges should be kept in their normal, traditional and extremely distinguished place.

Another matter of specifics is the number of judges on the advisory committee while preserving the lay majority. It might be rather nice if a circuit judge managed to get on to the committee, in so far as there might be an extra judge on it. It would be even nicer if that circuit judge just happened to be a former solicitor. One doubts whether that could conceivably happen, such would be the array of the establishment against such an idea. If solicitors can be sufficiently qualified, talented and able to be judges, perhaps they might have a place and an active role together with the other half of the profession and the judiciary generally on the advisory committee. I do not think that such a role should ever be resisted.

Hon. Members have made considerable reference to the cab rank rule. What my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has already said—and will doubtless say again—was not the same as the attitude taken by the Lord Chancellor in Committee in the other place, when the proposal was defeated, or on Report in the other place when, against the advice of the Lord Chancellor and the Government, the proposal was narrowly passed. From what has been said, it is clear that the cab rank rule has gained an almost hallowed status. In all honesty and humility and with all respect, in my legal career I cannot remember people going up and down the steps of my chambers, damning the cab rank rule and saying that their careers had been ruined because they could not take this or that case. Perhaps it was with such thoughts in mind that the national press used phrases such as, "a wrecking amendment", and that the amendment was promoted "by self-interest", and to "preserve the status quo" and even that it was "hypocritical in nature". Although it goes too far, that was the reaction of the outside world.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) more than addressed himself to the detail of the provision. The cab rank rule was very much in evidence in the early stages of my career. I appreciate that it is the ethos of the Bar that at five o'clock in the evening when one goes to the clerk's room in chambers, it is a case of "Cambridge for you", Ipswich for you", "London sessions for you" and of goodness knows where else. Subsequently in one's career, not only do the sort of rules and regulations that have already been referred to come into the fray, but availability also comes into the picture. I have never yet encountered a clerk who was not good enough at least to protect in general the careers of those for whom he was responsible.

Under the veneer of so-called competition, we should not block out one of the Bill's central aims, which is the freedom of the poor old consumer, who sometimes comes less and less into the discussion when lawyers get going. As it stands, the clear purport of the provision is to put a solicitor off becoming an advocate in the area where he is most likely to be asked to become an advocate, which might be a case in which the client wants him to act and that he knows all about.

Therefore, while I note the Government's present position, I must advise my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General that that position is not wholly accepted. Although I noted down his words, I shall not remind my right hon. and learned Friend of them except to say that I know that he is talking about a principle rather than about the specific phraseology and drafting of that clause. The Law Society and many others will listen to all the arguments on this issue. The Government's change on this matter means that I must firmly register with my right hon. and learned Friends on the Treasury Bench the fact that those discussions will go further.

A related question with which I hope we shall not have to bother—I regret that it has crept in—is the far-fetched argument that was raised in the other place that the separation of the preparation of a case from the advocacy of it is a hallowed principle that precludes a solicitor from becoming an advocate. I hope that we can avoid that argument. I am all for the objective role of the advocate, but it is wrong to use that as a hallowed principle to prevent the Bill's purpose.

I hope that the following matters will be raised in Standing Committee. First, there will obviously be several amendments and matters to be considered in relation to conveyancing and to probate law, especially with regard to professional standards and the independence of advice. When it comes to the last word, perhaps the market place is not everything, and professional standards are something—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I have always been a moderate member of the Government party, as Opposition Members should know, and I am now making a legal rather than a political speech.

Secondly, I hope that the issue of conditional fees will be considered. I have always had great personal reservations about conditional fees. I know that within the profession there is broad acceptance of the Bill as it stands on this matter, but I wish to register this point of concern that I expect will arise again.

My third point relates to multi-disciplinary practices. The Bar and the Law Society have a mutual concern about this. As such practices are being considered, at the very least we need to establish some tight rules.

Fourthly, there is widespread concern about the performance of the courts, especially the county courts, which have already been mentioned. The Bill must address this concern satisfactorily, and in so far as it does so, that must be satisfactorily explained by the Law Officers.

Fifthly, I welcome the proposals on the Parliamentary Commissioner. He must effectively cover court staff, who must not hide behind too wide an interpretation of what is or is not judicial or the result of some form of judicial action.

A final important point that will need to be considered in Standing Committee is the fact that, just because the Lord Chancellor's Department is responsible for judicial appointments, it does not mean that that function should be removed from being the responsibility of a Select Committee of this House.

Whatever happens from now on, may the result of it be a better Bill.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): As a non-lawyer, I hesitate to intrude in these deliberations, but as the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) mentioned fleetingly, the consumer must be considered in all this. The Bill is welcome only to the extent that it is a long-overdue shake-up of a profession which, with honourable exceptions at every level—I acknowledge that —has managed to combine appalling levels of service, outrageous fees and a degree of self-satisfaction unmatched by any other profession. To the extent that the Bill does not achieve that, that job will remain to be carried out on another occasion.

I am a socialist, but I must say that if ever a profession urgently needed a dose of market forces, it must be the legal profession. In saying that, I acknowledge the reservations expressed by my right hon. and learned Friends the Members for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and for Warley, West (Mr. Archer). The extent to which the Bill rises to the occasion must be measured by the outrage that it has provoked in the higher levels of the legal establishment. The Lord Chancellor made a promising start and provoked a vintage performance in the other place from the Lord Chief Justice, which provided a valuable insight into the judicial mind when the wig is off. I regret that the Lord Chancellor has been leaned on to some extent and that the original proposals have been watered down.

Any measures designed to increase rights of audience in courts are welcome, as are measures to reduce delays, to break lawyers' conveyancing monopolies, to provide effective redress against incompetent lawyers and to widen the charmed circle of those who become judges—a glance at the latest edition of the "Freemasons Handbook" shows that there is some scope for improvement.

In the brief time allotted to me in the debate I shall concentrate on a couple of omissions from the Bill. Judges have had quite a lot to say about the Bill in the other place and elsewhere so I hope that they will not mind if we have a thing or two to say about them. The retirement age of appeal court judges should be lowered as a matter of urgency to, say, 65 for a start. I believe that it was only in the last decade that the retirement age was lowered to 75, and even that failed to catch Lord Denning. Some attention should be paid to filling any vacancies that arise with persons whose horizons extend beyond the saloon bars of Surrey.

The major point that I wish to make is that there is a major omission from Bills such as this which will have to be rectified. The Bill is wide ranging and it would have been appropriate for it to provide some remedy to deal with persistently alleged miscarriages of justice. It is becoming something of a legend in Britain that it is extremely difficult to persuade the Court of Appeal or, indeed, lawyers in general—with honourable exceptions —to own up to the possibility of serious mistakes. That is one of the more enduring features of our legal system.

I was reading only this afternoon Ludovic Kennedy's introduction to "10 Rillington Place". He described the campaign that it was necessary to pursue before it was conceded after 16 years that Timothy Evans was innocent. That difficulty has become topical again in recent years as a result of a handful of celebrated cases. The Carl Bridgewater case is one of them, and the Broadwater Farm case is another. The best known are those of the six people convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings and the total of 10 people convicted in connection with the Guildford and Woolwich bombings.

Everyone knows that one of the principal difficulties in those cases is that senior lawyers are unwilling or extremely reluctant to face the possibility that mistakes have been made by other senior lawyers. In the case of the Birmingham pub bombings, it is obvious that one of the major difficulties was that Lord Bridge, who was the original trial judge and is now one of the most senior judges in the land, went overboard in his original trial judgment and his going overboard was endorsed in January 1988 by the Lord Chief Justice. It is clear that before any progress can be made on that case, which is beginning to blight the entire legal system, the resignation or retirement of the Lord Chief Justice will be necessary.

Before anyone cites the case of the four people convicted of the Guildford pub bombings as an example of the willingness of the judicial system to own up to mistakes, I remind the House that the convictions were quashed only because the Director of Public Prosecutions —an honourable man, for whom I have the greatest respect—went to the Court of Appeal. I was there and had the pleasure of seeing the Lord Chief Justice's face as he was forced, with clenched teeth, to quash the convictions. The DPP went to the Court of Appeal and asked for the convictions to be quashed in terms which left the Lord Chief Justice no discretion whatever.

Many of those who were present on that occasion, including many eminent lawyers, were in no doubt that if the DPP had allowed the Lord Chief Justice the slightest discretion the Lord Chief Justice could have talked his way even out of the new evidence. I say that because I also sat through the Lord Chief Justice's disgraceful judgment in the case of the Birmingham Six when he performed intellectual gymnastics of a spectacular variety.

Probably the most persistent miscarriage of justice, which most clearly demonstrates the great problem with our legal system—it will have to be addressed sooner or later and it is a pity that this issue is not addressed in the Bill—is the Cooper and McMahon case. In 1970 two men were convicted of murdering a postmaster in Luton. By about 1974 it became clear to the Home Secretary of the day that something was seriously wrong in that case. Four successive Home Secretaries between 1974 and 1980 referred the case to the Court of Appeal. On each occasion the judges sat, stonyfaced, and said, "We have heard nothing new—take them away." In 1980 it became so embarrassing that the Home Secretary of the day, William Whitelaw, because he could not devise a way to persuade the judges to own up, simply ordered the gates of the prison to be opened, gave the men a railway ticket each and sent them home without so much as an apology for the decade that they had spent in gaol.

I fear that the same will happen eventually in the case of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings. There are people of good will at every level and in all parties but no one can devise a way of persuading the Court of Appeal to own up.

The Attorney-General: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman's fairly familiar record, but the last phrase calls for some explanation, even from him. He said that there was no other way of persuading the Court of Appeal to own up. I hope that he will reflect on what he has just said. The Court of Appeal is obliged to deal with references from the Home Secretary, which take the form of appeals, on the evidence put before it. The hon. Gentleman will recall that the Court of Appeal sat for some five weeks, that it considered all the evidence that the applicants sought to put before it and that it came to its decision in a judgment which is in the Library of this House, on the basis of that evidence. I hope that he will reflect on what he said about owning up.

Mr. Mullin: I have had a great deal of opportunity to reflect on the matter. I was present throughout most of the 30 days of the appeal hearing. It is clear to me that many people in high places, although not necessarily the Lord Chief Justice, know that a mistake has been made—they knew for years that a mistake had been made in the Timothy Evans case—but they have great difficulty in finding a way out, as has been remarked on by commentators of the same political persuasion as the Attorney-General. The right hon. and learned Gentleman comes from the merciful wing of his party and he knows the problem as well as I do.

I am pleased to see that the Chairman of the Select Committee on Home Affairs is present. In 1982, the Select Committee came up with a potential solution to the problem. It examined the matter in detail and made a good report. It unanimously recommended that some form of court of last resort should be set up with power to consider, among other things, evidence which was inadmissible before the courts. It is important to note that there would have been several non-lawyers on the panel. That was rejected out of hand by the Government, but after some negotiation the Lord Chief Justice—who, even then, was Lord Lane—promised more flexibility in taking references back from the Home Office. If he ever made that promise, he reneged on it. One of the most interesting paragraphs at the end of his judgment in the Birmingham case was uttered in the knowledge that the Guildford and Woolwich cases were in the pipeline. He said:

> "As with so many of these cases referred to us by the Home Office, the longer it went on the more convinced we became that the convictions were safe."

In other words, "Don't waste our time by sending Guildford". The Department did send Guildford and we now see what happened.

In 1988 the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) and I attemped to amend the Criminal Justice Bill and implement some sort of court of last resort. We modelled our amendment carefully on the wording that the Select Committee had unanimously recommended in 1982. We attracted all-party support for the amendment. I regret that the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), who was on the Committee in 1982 and was present during the discussion of the amendment, did not support it. Indeed, he sat in silence and made a dash for the No Lobby at the appropriate moment. I hope that he will now reflect on the matter and come to a different conclusion.

The result is that we are now faced with further scandals which are corrupting the whole judicial system. Sooner or later a way out will have to be found. There is another possibility. Sir John May, a distinguished judge, is conducting an inquiry into what went wrong in the Guildford case. I have the highest expectations of Sir John May's inquiry, but the precedents are not all that good. The Brabin inquiry into the Evans case concluded, after he had been pardoned, that he probably had murdered the baby and not his wife. Sir Henry Fisher's inquiry into the Confait case concluded that the people who had just been released and had their convictions quashed were probably guilty. That had to be repudiated when the real killer was found. Lord Hunter's inquiry into what went wrong in the Meehan case concluded that Meehan probably had done it. He had to be repudiated when Meehan had to be given a large amount of compensation.

The precedents are not good, but I approach Sir John May's inquiry with an open mind. I noted that in his opening statement he made it clear to the police representatives that if anyone attempted to persuade him that the purpose of the exercise was merely to reconvict people who had just had their convictions quashed, he would not hear evidence designed solely for that purpose. I hope that he sticks to that.

It is interesting to note that the General Council of the Bar and the Law Society both submitted evidence to the May inquiry calling for some sort of court of last resort. A personal letter which I received from a Law Lord—I shall not embarrass him by naming him—states:

> "The case for a 'Court of Last Resort' is a strong one. We need an independent court of review freed from the burden of routine work and with no track record to defend, which can review fact and law and is charged to consider the whole case."

That is an idea for which the time has come. I regret that the Bill has not seized the opportunity, but it will have to be done at some time because this scandal is beginning to infect the whole of our judicial system. I hope that eventually it will be put right, if not by the present Government, then by a future Labour Government.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): I begin by declaring an interest as a practising solicitor, and I shall try to make my speech brief. I have practised for nearly 20 years in a provincial firm of solicitors in the sphere of litigation, dealing with divorce, crime, licensing and civil work in the county courts and High Court.

If anyone had asked any of my clients their principal worry, apart from the quality of my advice, he might have heard about three principal concerns: first, why does everything take so long; secondly, why does it cost so much; and thirdly, why cannot we get legal aid? Therefore, legal aid, legal delays and the costs of law are the three great worries of the average client. Any Bill on legal services should address those particular issues because they are the ones that worry the public. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General is entirely happy that those three key issues are being addressed.

I shall mention but two matters in the Bill: first, access to the High Court. Hitherto, we have been entitled to take our cases to the High Court. There has been no restriction, and anyone can begin a case there, whatever the case. That has been good. It is excellent to increase the jurisdiction of the county court, but I wonder why we are proposing to restrict access to our High Court. Might we not consider introducing competition into the court system, giving litigants the choice of which court in which to begin—county or High Court—and then directing resources to those courts that prove the most popular? The ability to go to the High Court, unfettered, is an important one.

I sometimes worry that our High Court is monopolised by the big, corporate clients and foreign multi-national concerns, which have the ability to use our High Court system without paying a penny for the privilege, apart from their lawyers' fees. The more that such multinationals end up in our High Court, the less individuals from this country have the opportunity to take their case there.

The second aspect of the Bill is the cab rank rule, referred to so frequently tonight. In the past, it has been applied by the Bar. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) that, by and large, the Bar has applied it pretty well. In my experience during 20 years, the Bar has been good in that respect. Solicitors, however, have not had to abide by the cab rank rule, although in my practice I tried hard to do so. I have occasionally had to turn a client away, but by and large I took each case as it came, whether I liked the nature of the alleged offence and whether or not the client had legal aid.

[Mr. Humfrey Malins]

It is important that solicitors practising advocacy should take cases, whether they be legally aided or private, and give a consistent and high standard of service to all.

I am glad that the cab rank principle has been inserted as a condition of obtaining new rights of audience. It is right that those who are granted the privilege of High Court rights should accept the burdens as well. I believe that I heard my right hon. and learned Friend say that he was considering exempting employed lawyers from the cab rank principle. If he did, I venture to suggest that this might be a mistake. I hope that in winding up my right hon. and learned Friend will develop that point.

I am concerned about the state of the solicitors' profession in 1990, compared with the profession 20 years ago. I am not sure that, today, a council tenant gets the same quality of advice as he or she would have had 20 years ago. I am not sure that the elderly lady on moderate means gets the same quality of service as she received 20 years ago. I am not sure that the best advice is still available to the poorest. Why is that?

There must be a variety of reasons. One may be that we are living in the days of the big battalions of law practices. I am worried that the big, slick city firms trawl round the universities, creaming off the best brains with the promise of corporate and commercial work in our big cities at treble the salaries of country firms. I am also worried that small firms in small towns amalgamate, and sometimes move out of town to create bigger organisations for the lure of corporate and commercial work. Other firms tend to concentrate more on the profitable work and delegate legal aid work to junior clerks or, worse, turn it away.

I say these things not by way of criticism, because everyone is human, but as something which makes me sad. I do not think that we are moving towards a system in which the poorer people in our society will retain the best quality of service. About 20 years ago, people tended to join a solicitor's practice because they wanted to serve the community. They knew they would have to do some unpaid work for the public good, but there was a certain dignity in the profession. Now, I am sorry to say, at the end of the year too many partnerships look not so much to the service for their clients, but to the service for their fleet of BMWs.

I conclude on that sad note. I mean it as no criticism of my brother solicitors. It is partly due to the world we live in, which is not a world I particularly like. Our duty in this House is to ensure that we pass a Bill that will result in the same quality of service for rich and poor alike.

8.18 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I congratulate the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) on his speech, which I wholly endorse.

I declare an interest as having been a solicitor in the past and a barrister now. When the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West talks about service in firms of solicitors 20 years ago, I know what he means. It was what I was hinting at during the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), when I suggested that we were approaching the matter from the wrong end.

We should consider how it feels to the man in the street —the chap who lives in the rural village who has a modest job, modest home and modest means. Several fates may befall him. His wife may walk out or he may get thrown out—it matters not because the principle is the same—and he will need matrimonial advice. Where will he go? Twenty years ago, when I practised as a solicitor in Sheffield and served the rural areas around, if that happened in Bakewell, Alfreton or another small village or town, a man could go to the local solicitor who had been in the village for 20, 30 or 40 years and knew the area and the problems. That solicitor, with the solicitor acting on the other side, could efficiently, and often at little cost, resolve the matrimonial problem.

The Bill will go to the statute book in its present form because those who thought it through, on issues such as conveyancing, forgot a crucial point: rural practices die without a conveyancing element. In the old days conveyancing carried many a private practice through the winter, so to speak. It was the financial backbone of a practice. Rural practices did not charge people who came in to make wills. Charging people for wills at commercial rates such as those charged in the City would involve hundreds of pounds, and what pensioner could afford that? So the service was provided by the Law Society in the old days, and I hope that the society will continue to offer it.

The person in the village who wanted to buy a house, to get divorced or to make a will had a local solicitor. We shall rue the day when we say that commercialism and efficiency should supersede the element of service in the Law Society of yesterday. I must tell the Attorney-General in the kindest possible way that if he allows himself and the Government to be railroaded down this route he will be making a grave mistake.

Let us imagine that the man in the village runs over someone or is run over himself. Once again, he will need a lawyer, a specialist. In the old days he went to the rural solicitor, who sent him on, perhaps, to the town solicitor, who, in those days, knew about these matters— [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) does not know much about these matters, and I must tell him that we are discussing an issue that matters to the vast majority of people in this land.

There comes a moment when a person needs good advice. In the old days he went to the local solicitor, in the village or the town. He could sort out what expertise was needed, which is where specialisation comes in. I concede that big London firms of solicitors have special expertise, but some of what we have heard recently in the Fayed case and others makes me wonder whether commercialism brings with it a price in terms of loss of integrity. We must be careful least money become a god in the profession. The moment that happens, professionalism will start to go.

For many years I was a local solicitor and when a local person came to me for advice I looked round for the man or woman who was expert in the relevant field, and sent briefs to this or that counsel because he was independent and good. Counsel knew what they were doing; they survive only one mistake. Thereafter, the word goes out and they are finished.

If the Bill is passed, if the cab rank rule goes and if the solicitor advocate who does not know these disciplines is allowed to pick and choose—as I pointed out in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi)—the customer may not get the best possible advice.

When I became a barrister I did not look on it as a change of profession. I saw it as another step in specialisation, because that is all the criminal Bar is—specialised advocates who know what a case is all about, who know the rules and who are efficient. That is the only way to survive. The profession is fiercely competive and we should not underrate it or write it off. On the contrary, we should remember its value and compare it with the American system. The Government should be careful: they are beginning to walk a dangerous road by allowing commercialism to override professionalism. Of course, we can resolve the problems of solicitor judges and so on, but let us always remember the man in the street. It is he whom the professions seek to serve and it is his interests that the House should be debating the Bill.

The Bill includes many mistakes that must be rectified. If, at the end of the day, a Bill emerges that will serve the man in the street with the best possible professionalism we shall have done a good job. We must cast aside our prejudices and think with open minds if we are to serve that man.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I had not imagined that I would find myself almost wholly in agreement with everything that the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) has just said.

I cannot claim to be a layman, but it is 20 years since I practised as a solicitor. Before that, I practised for some years in the City, and I am still a member of the Law Society. I think that I am unique in being the only Member to have been opposed at a general election—in 1970—by an official anti-solicitor candidate, the redoubtable Mr. Carter, who was one of the first to do freelance conveyancing. He made some nice remarks about me in his election address, and he lost his deposit, so all was well in the end. It was a bit hard on me, because I did not do much conveyancing at the time.

I want to speak first about advocacy and rights of audience. When I was practising, the last thing that my colleagues or I wanted was to appear in the High Court as advocates. We have plenty of other matters to occupy our time, and we wanted to use the best expertise we could find from the Bar. That was commonly true of the City of London and of other parts of the country; the system seemed to serve my clients and the interests of the country very well. That is why I wholly support the need to preserve an independent Bar. The last thing I want is that its members should become muddled up in the American style with attorneys here, there and everywhere.

The maintenance of an independent Bar is essential, and the amendments that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has made to the Bill would make that possible, whereas the original Bill would not have. However, the Bar must recognise that, in Gallup polls—in so far as one ever pays attention to such polls—80 per cent. of people say that they want solicitors to have the opportunity to appear in court if necessary. It is ridiculous that solicitors cannot appear in certain instances which probably do not require the greatest expertise. That it why it is necessary to open up the rules and rights of audience.

I shall not go over all the arguments about the cab rank rule again, except to say that it is obvious that the clause imposed in another place, which was a wrecking proposal by their Lordships, needs careful reconsideration. I think that it was clear from what the Attorney-General said that that will be rectified in Committee. I certainly hope that it will be.

I want to say a word in favour of the Bar in relation to liability. The consumer associations are wrong to imagine that complete liability can be imposed on the Bar when it is carrying out its work. It is perfectly proper that it should be liable and not have immunity if it makes obvious errors, such as failing to turn up in court or acting in a grossly negligent way outside the court, but in court it is essential that the Bar enjoy immunity in the same way as witnesses and we in this House do.

If we were to be sued and dragged into court all the time, what sort of debates would we have here? The same applies to the advocate in court; he must enjoy immunity if he is to give uninhibited service to his client. We do not need to copy the United States or any other country slavishly in this respect. There is a tendency to think far too much in transatlantic terms. I have always been wholly opposed to the contingency free racket that prevails in the United States. Far too many litigants are dragged into all the traumas of court by over-exuberant American Perry Masons or people like him. It would be appalling if that came about here.

I am a little uneasy about the proposal for taking cases on spec, as it were. Anyone who is a Pickwick fan will recall how angry it made Mr. Pickwick that the odious firm of Dodson and Fogg was discovered taking the case of Mrs. Bardell on spec. A fat lot of good it did poor Mrs. Bardell, as it turned out. In Committee, we must be careful to ensure that the fees that a lawyer can charge for taking a case on spec should not bear a remarkable resemblance to a percentage of the damages obtained. I am not at all happy about that, but if we consider it carefully, we can probably reach a compromise. What we really need is not more but less litigation.

Conveyancing is the aspect of the law with which the vast majority of people come into contact. As has been said, it is the most important thing in their lives. I whole-heartedly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) and the hon. Member for St. Helens, South about rural practices. The basis of small rural firms has been their conveyancing work. They have rendered a good service to their clients and have often provided other services free. Sometimes, even litigation has been subsidised by conveyancing work. That will disappear unless we are extremely careful.

I am disturbed that banks and big financial institutions will take over conveyancing. I hope that careful checks will be placed on them. Several banks have been acquiring estate agents. The standards of the estate agents' profession are much lower than those of the Bar, of solicitors or of any other profession. Many examples of abuses and conflicts of interest have been brought to light which have been to the great disadvantage of clients and humble citizens. It would be sad if the service rendered by traditional solicitors in rural areas to humble people was lost in a mass of gigantic conglomerates which operate on a purely financial basis. Therefore, the Lord Chancellor's regulations in clause 39 must be considered carefully.

In general, this is a good Bill, which moves in the right direction. I am surprised that the Opposition oppose it, and I cannot understand why. Much remains to be done in Committee. Most of the work will have to be done there. I ask the House, especially the Law Officers, to remember that cheapness is not always best. The old phrase "cheap and nasty" is as applicable today as when I learned it from my grandmother.

In recent years, the trend has been to treat conveyancing as a purely commercial activity. It is nothing of the sort. We have likened the profession's activities to selling bananas and second-hand motor cars. They certainly are not. They are different. If we are to make the legal profession effective—the Bill will help—we must bear in mind the need to preserve and enhance the lawyer-client relationship of trust, fearless support and independence. That is how clients and society will get the justice and redress which they deserve.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I am a non-lawyer, so my remarks will be extremely brief. So far, most of the debate seems to have been something of a domestic dispute between the Bar Council and the Law Society about the relative merits of each profession. I do not want to enter into that, as I have no experience of it, but I wish to make one or two points about the Bill.

It is proposed that most future litigation will be commenced within the county courts. I am worried how that will affect personal injury cases. I have some limited experience of them because I negotiated many settlements before I was elected to the House. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) told us of the problems of the county court system and my local law society has related to me the problems and workload of various county courts throughout the country. It is worried that the Bill's provisions will not be backed up with adequate resources to resolve the delays and problems.

Again, it has been related to me that some litigants in personal injury cases may be disadvantaged by being required to commence their case in the county court rather than the High Court, especially if the case is serious or if the potential damages could be substantial. They will be disadvantaged by delays. Some negotiators and solicitors may be disadvantaged in negotiating a settlement, as the insurance company or defendant will know that the plaintiff has recourse only to the county court and not to the High Court, so has access to county court costs only. Some solicitors and negotiators believe that they will be disadvantaged in negotiating a high proportion of settlements because of that. Moreover, as all personal injury cases will fall on the county court system, it will be further clogged up, and there will be many more delays.

Potential conflicts of interest could arise when financial institutions, such as building societies and insurance companies, rather than solicitors, undertake conveyancing. I am no particular fan of the solicitors' monopoly on conveyancing, but I am aware of the dangers for the ordinary man in the street of changing it. An estate agent may advise him to take on an endowment mortgage, which will not be in his best interests if in a few years he moves house, as it will not have had a chance to mature.

The estate agent who provides the mortgage may recommend the in-house solicitor who can do the conveyancing at a reasonable or cut-price rate. The primary purpose of a building society or financial institution, which is to sell a financial package or a mortgage, could conflict with the best interests of the client. That is made worse when a tied practitioner is involved. As I understand it, he can give only best advice over the range of financial packages of products which he may sell.

Individuals in such circumstances will face considerable pressure. If an individual can be provided with all the elements of his house purchase at one office, he is unlikely to seek advice elsewhere. The basic principle is independent advice. Many people who enter into the largest purchase that they will make in their lives may not get that advice.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) also mentioned estate agents. On 1 March 1990, the consumer magazine Which? in an investigation of estate agents showed that some buyers were handicapped because they chose not to use the financial services of the estate agent. For example, a lower offer was accepted because the bidder agreed to take an in-house mortgage and to use in-house financial services. It is essential that such people are given strictly independent advice, and I hope that that section will be widely debated in Committee.

Clause 85 deals with the limitation period for the commencement of actions, on which I have been involved in some correspondence, again with regard to personal injury cases where the time limit appears to be being reduced to three years. Previously, a protective writ could be issued within three years, which would then allow an extra 12 months for a case to be prepared by solicitors. Proceedings will now have to be commenced within the three-year limitation period, apparently because the Government are seeking to reduce delay in such actions. That is unlikely to be the effect. Indeed, delays could be increased. Moreover, many people may be denied access to the law in cases of personal injury simply because they have particular problems in preparing their case.

There are considerable arguments for extending the limitation period rather than reducing it—for example, in cases of serious injury, where the plaintiff may take a long time to recover; where the prognosis could not be established until some years after the accident, particularly in the case of a progressive industrial disease such as pneumoconiosis; or where knowledge of the claim or the right of action does not become apparent for some considerable time—for example, where a specialist engineer's report might reveal that there was cause of action where previously solicitors did not think that there was.

Under the new circumstances, proceedings could be commenced hastily to protect a claim within the three-year limitation period, and shortly afterwards the practitioner could find that, because of a rapid improvement in the medical situation or a technical report, the cause of action was dramatically changed. In such a case the solicitor might be liable for costs for commencing a case too early or in the wrong court. Recently, a solicitor wrote to me saying:

> "Vast sums of money are wasted issuing writs most of which are never served against defendants who may perhaps be guilty but of whom many no doubt are completely innocent. It is an idle exercise: a scandalous waste of time and money which serves no useful purpose whatsoever."

Reducing the limitation period will not solve the problem.

The clause will deny many claimants access to the law. Many people have come to me three years after the date of their accident and I have had the unhappy duty of telling them that they have no case to pursue simply because they are out of time because of limitation periods of which they knew little if anything.

The reduction in the limitation period will not reduce delay in cases; it will simply complicate matters. The civil justice review body said that the limitation period was to prevent defendants facing old cases, not to reduce delay. It did not say that proceedings should be commenced within that limitation period. That does not address the particular problem.

I welcome the creation of a legal services ombudsman. I have been pursuing a case for more than two years, but within 30 seconds of walking into an interview with the Law Society I was informed that the legal practitioner with whom I was dealing was negligent, that there was nothing that could be done about it, and that the individual concerned would have to sue. Two years later, I am no further forward with that case, despite considerable correspondence and many meetings. I hope that the legal services ombudsman will address that problem.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I have been the legal adviser of the Institute of Legal Executives for about 15 years, but not once during this Second Reading debate have legal executives been mentioned. Yet all who practise, either at the Bar or as a solicitor, will know the debt that they owe to legal executives. I am glad to see the former Solicitor-General nodding in agreement. It is important to acknowledge and to recognise the work that they do. They prepare instructions for counsel, they brief counsel and they are experts in procedure, probate, litigation, advocacy and so on. The Bill provides a unique opportunity to give them the recognition that they have earned over the years.

The Institute of Legal Executives was formed in 1960, but it owes its origins to the 1920s and the Managing Clerks Association and, in turn, to a former organisation which was founded in the late 19th century. Its record goes back almost 100 years. It has 20,000 members who take four general papers in law practice and four further papers. In 1989 no fewer than 15,000 members took the examinations. That gives some idea of the kind of work that legal executives do and the qualifications that they achieve.

In education, training and discipline legal executives play an immensely important role in the service of the law. They are well qualified, and the lack of recognition that they have received is extraordinary when, under the Bill, a person who is in no way qualified in the law could end up as a member of the Bench—an extraordinary state of affairs.

There are one or two clauses in which legal executives have a particular role to play. For example, clause 15 deals with whether a person should be granted a right of audience or a right to conduct litigation in relation to any court or proceedings. The criteria listed include > "(a) whether he is qualified in accordance with the educational and training requirements appropriate to the court or proceedings;

> (b) whether he is a member of a professional or other body which—
> (i) has rules of conduct . . . governing the conduct of its members;
> (ii) has an effective mechanism for enforcing those rules of conduct; and > (iii) is likely to enforce them".

In all those respects, important as they are, the member of the Institute of Legal Executives would expect to be granted a right of audience and the right to conduct litigation. I sincerely trust that that will be implemented when the time comes in the context of the advisory committee.

Clause 17 states that there will be 14 members of the advisory committee, excluding the chairman, making a total of 15, of which two must be practising barristers, two practising solicitors and two persons with experience in the teaching of the law. Eight other persons are to be appointed after consultation with such organisations as the Lord Chancellor considers appropriate. There is an overwhelming case for including at least one representative of the Institute of Legal Executives in that list.

As persons with experience in the teaching of the law are included, and as the institute has a crucial role in legal education, given its disciplinary code and the manner in which it runs its affairs, the time has come to give the institute the recognition that it deserves. That would be conferred not exclusively upon the institute, but upon its members. Such recognition would ensure also that they could enjoy the confidence that comes from knowing that they are recognised for performing the first-rate work that they have carried out in the public service for a very long time.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I, too, have no interests to declare, other than the fact that, in common with many right hon. and hon. Members, I deal from time to time with the consequences of legal cases and with solicitors and barristers.

I welcome, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley), the concept of a legal services ombudsman. Any right hon. or hon. Member who has dealt with a case against a firm of solicitors or a barrister knows of the appalling difficulties presented by the existing procedures of the Law Society and Bar Council. That is not to be critical of either body, but the existing arrangements and the relationships between both bodies, and between members of the legal profession and their clients, are so complex as to make it very difficult to secure a positive outcome. The result is, perhaps inevitably, always something of a fudge. My experience of the legal profession is that there is a need for an ombudsman, and I am pleased that the Bill makes provision for one.

No right hon. or hon. Member has yet welcomed the extension of the role of the Parliamentary Commissioner. There has long been a need to clarify the relationship between the commissioner's department and that of the Lord Chancellor in investigating the actions of court officers in relation to administrative matters in general. I congratulate the Lord Chancellor on addressing that issue. The provisions in the Bill mean that anyone who has waited for some time for money from the courts, for example, will be able to look for some redress from the ombudsman.

My final and most important point concerns compensation for those who are bereaved as a result of an accident. I particularly have in mind correspondence that I have received from members of the Liverpool Law Society following their experiences in dealing with the aftermath of the Hillsborough tragedy 12 months ago. The Criminal Justice Act 1982 provides for compensation of up to £3,500 where the deceased person was under the age of 18 or was a husband or wife of someone over that age. The experience of the consortium of Liverpool solicitors dealing with the bereaved families of those killed at Hillsborough is that neither category deals with all cases satisfactorily. They point out that the age limit is not the best way of assessing the relationship between a young person and his family. The youngster who continues receiving education at college or university after the age of 18 is a classic example of someone who is still, to some extent, dependent on his or her parents. The solicitors argue that the age limit is too arbitrary a criterion and that each case should be considered on its merits.

[Mr. George Howarth]

The 1982 Act does not provide for common law husbands or wives and thus reflect society as it is. The existing legislation creates much hardship and certainly a great deal of heartache in dealing with the aftermath of tragedies such as Hillsborough, Zeebrugge and King's Cross. The view of the Liverpool Law Society is that the amount of compensation should be increased. I suggest a figure such as the £10,000 proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) in a private Member's Bill.

The question of age as a key criterion for eligibility should also be re-examined, taking more generously into account the circumstances of the individuals concerned. Finally, in the context of compensation, common law partnerships should be recognised as being equally as valid as marriage. I hope that those important issues will be pursued in Committee. If such proposals are adopted, I am more likely to vote for the Bill at a later stage than I am tonight.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The winding-up speeches are expected to begin at 9.20 pm. Four hon. Members who have been in their seats for a long time wish to speak, and I trust that they will share the remaining time available among themselves.

8.55 pm

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Having listened to much of the debate, I feel that I need some relief from the constant chorus from the legal profession as to its wonderful nature. Frankly, if one talks to the individual who has used a solicitor for conveyancing or in litigation, one begins to realise that belief in the high quality of the legal profession is not well-founded.

Many believe that the legal profession is a delicate but perfect flower and that it may be damaged by market forces and the abolition of restrictive practices. That is a load of tosh and nonsense. I can think of no less efficient, less effective or slower profession than this country's legal profession. By and large, it would be difficult to find individuals having better intellectual abilities. However, they should be able to organise their affairs in a far better way. There is something very wrong with the ethos of the profession—which, despite the self-congratulatory facade that has been presented tonight, needs a thorough shake-up. I am not sure that the Bill goes far enough, but it goes some way to that end.

It was incredible to hear right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House suggest that people buying houses should subsidise litigation by accident victims or divorcees. That is absolute bunkum. It was also claimed that solicitors give financial advice. I have bought five houses, but no solicitor ever gave me financial guidance, or said, "I know better than you, young man. Why not do this, that or the other?"

It is nonsense to suggest that a primary function of solicitors is to protect their clients from buying the wrong property. In the rising market of last year, I should like to know how many solicitors asked their clients, "Do you realise that house prices can fall as well as rise, and that interest rates might increase?" It is also claimed that solicitors are sensitive to local conditions and know what their clients should do, but that is largely untrue. It is certainly not my experience with the legal profession. The preservation of the legal profession's privileges is not in the public interest. The more that we can do to open up the profession and introduce competition the better.

I have been looking back at the amounts that I have paid for the conveyancing of my houses over the years. I first bought a house in 1969, and paid more in cash terms for a solicitor than I paid just the other year. I stopped using solicitors and first used the National Association of Home Owners, which was one way of getting round the solicitors' monopoly. Then I used an unlicensed conveyancer. Recently I have gone back to using a solicitor, simply because competition is such that solicitors offer a package that is too good to miss. The quality and the speed with which they get on with the job has gone up and up. The less money they charge, the less time they can take and the more efficient they must be. That must be good for the consumer—and we have heard so little about the consumer, other than the self-congratulatory remarks of the lawyers who are looking after them so well.

The idea that we should put any restrictions on the way in which the market for conveyances has opened up, or on the one-stop shopping for people to go in, obtain a mortgage and financial advice and get their conveyancing done, should be strongly resisted. We need regulations that protect the consumer but do not protect the monopoly of the legal profession.

Let me give a few examples. I bought a house in Huddersfield, along with 200 other people on our estate; after several years it turned out that the sewers had collapsed. Almost every solicitors' practice in Huddersfield, and in many surrounding towns, was involved in conveyancing houses on that estate. We are all told that if we use a solicitor we shall be protected against anything going wrong, but what did we find? All the solicitors had sent a Law Society form to the local council, asking whether the houses were connected to a public sewer. The local authority's answer was yes. What the form did not ask was whether it was the public sewer in the road immediately outside the house or the one two miles down the road. According to the Yorkshire water authority, the sewers in question were not adopted sewers.

All 200 house owners went back to their solicitors and said that they had not looked after their interests. The solicitors said, "We sent the form saying that the houses were connected to a public sewer, but you did not ask whether the sewer was in the road outside the house. We had to find that out for you." The problem went on for years. Eventually, a senior solicitor in one of the firms in Huddersfield got together with all the authorities, banged their heads together and finally sorted the problem out. The local authority and the water authority put money into a kitty, and the householders did not have to shell out anything. The solicitors all denied liability. None of them wanted to know when we asked whether it was possible to sue a solicitor for not protecting his client properly. All the humbug about solicitors protecting people is so much hot air.

Because the builder of that estate had gone bankrupt, I decided to go to an auction to buy the freehold reversions of the leasehold properties and put them out to tender so that people could buy them individually. I hoped to use only two solicitors—one for myself and one for the people wanting to buy. The solicitors said that all those wanting to buy could not use a single solicitor; they had to use separate solicitors. Two years later, not one freehold reversion had been conveyed to those people, because of the delay caused by solicitors saying that it was not worth their while to do the work. We gave them a three-month deadline to complete the work, but only half met it. I still own most of those freehold reversions today, and they provide me with a reasonable income.

I congratulate whatever Government brought in the small claims procedure. As a small business man in Yorkshire, I found that solicitors were not interested in going to court on my behalf to chase up debts of £200 or £300. I was able to find out from a helpful solicitor's clerk that it was possible to use the small claims procedure on my own. Because I was self-employed, I could go in and litigate against people who did not pay their bills. In the 10 years for which I did that, I probably handled 200 or more cases, most of which were settled out of court.

It is a simple procedure. When we went to an arbitrator, as long as there was a solicitor on the other side I knew that I had won, because they were never properly briefed by their clients and they never had enough information to fight the case properly. I lost only twice—to two little old men who were so befuddled that the arbitrator felt sympathetic towards them.

The maximum limit of £2,000 to take someone to a small claims court is ridiculously low. It would go nowhere if a builder came to build an extension, for instance. The amount should be raised to £10,000, £20,000 or even higher. Why should not people use the county court procedure, which is so simple? The arbitration procedure is easy and it allows the arbitrator to ask proper questions. It is a good and informal way to sort out disputes. It is essential that directors of small limited companies have right of audience in a county court. Currently, unless they are self-employed they do not have that.

Contingency fees are another way of shaking up the legal profession and of giving rights of access outside the legal aid system, and we should try to do that more and more. The freeing of rights of audience would help by providing competition. It would allow the winds of change to blow through the legal profession.

I have rapidly read through my notes because time is short. I am glad that the Bill has been introduced because it helps the consumer. However, consumers are far from satisfied with the legal profession. I am referring in the main to solicitors, as I am glad to say that I have not had to go to litigation with barristers looking after my interests. I have heard scare stories from people who say that their barristers have been badly prepared, do not have a proper brief and therefore do not represent them properly. I urge the Government carefully to consider the possibility of a barrister being negligent—not that he had poor judgment or that he has not done the job as well as another barrister might have done it. It should be possible to prosecute for negligence. We must ensure that people can get lawyers to fight cases against fellow lawyers.

9.6 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I wish to declare an interest as a former law centre solicitor, although I have not practised since the general election. I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to the radical nature of the Lord Chancellor's proposals. I broadly support them and I congratulate him on his courage in walking through the minefield of the unseemly row between solicitors and barristers. Nothing becomes the profession less than the way in which they squeal as they fight to retain their diminishing monopolies.

The proposals may founder not because of the self-interest of the profession, but because it lacks the resources necessary to carry them through. I welcome the extension of the rights of audience for solicitors. I was persuaded a long time ago of the necessity for a fused profession. It is wrong that members of the public must pay twice for representation. It is wrong that they must pay twice when their representatives switch halfway through the case. Solicitors are specialised in certain areas and it is right that they should be allowed to represent their clients in the highest courts of the land. I welcome the establishment of an advisory committee, which will have a lay majority.

On the cab rank principle, I am convinced of the need for a principle that allows solicitors to take on any case that comes their way. That is especially important for legal aid work. However, I was a little confused by what the Attorney-General said about the sex discrimination and race relations legislation. I am not sure whether he meant to include his reference on the cab rank principle. I hope that when he replies to the debate he will say whether it is possible to use any of the exemptions in that legislation. For example, could a woman solicitor represent only women clients if that was what she wished? I should like the cab rank principle to be represented in a code of practice rather than in the Bill. I am a little concerned about the way that it has been advanced by the Bar to coincide with the fact that solicitors are to have an increase in their rights of audience.

I welcome the changes during the last few years that have allowed people to use licensed conveyancers, and have resulted in a reduction in the cost of conveyancing. I have yet to meet many starving solicitors as a result of those changes. We should pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who was one of the first people to propose such legislation through his private Member's Bill. The law has been changed, but my fear is that it will go too far.

I am not convinced that big financial institutions will be able to draw the line on conflicts of interest. I have been convinced by the arguments of my local law society, especially by Peter Smith, the honorary secretary of Leicestershire Law Society, who sent me a number of cuttings from local newspapers, and one from Today dated 26 February 1990. I do not wish to say that I believe everything that appears in Today but the article seems to highlight a particular case, in which the Halifax Building Society, acting as estate agent, was able to convince people of the need to accept a lower offer by saying that by accepting that offer it would be able to arrange a mortgage. Those hidden costs of borrowing will become a feature if conveyancing is extended to financial institutions using in-house solicitors.

I like the idea of multi-disciplinary practices, but I think that they are unworkable in practice. They will threaten the independent and impartial service which solicitors now give. They will threaten client confidentiality and will make it more difficult for clients who are concerned about proceedings to pursue a complaint.

I wholeheartedly endorse the comments of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), which I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) will repeat, on the county courts. I and other hon. Members support the transfer of cases from the High Court to the county courts because we believe that that will enable them to be dealt with under the small claims procedure or other procedures at a local level far more effectively. However, I remind the Solicitor-General, who sat on the Committee that discussed the Children Bill, as I did, that when put into effect the Children Act 1989 will place a greater burden on the county court system. It has been remarked that the county court system makes a profit of £6 million a year. I do not see why some of that money cannot be used to lessen the present delays in the county court system and to make it easier for people to litigate before it. If the attention that we seek is not given to the county courts, the system will collapse.

I should have liked to have seen something more in the Bill about training for solicitors, but perhaps that will come later. I should also have liked to have seen some reference to the creation of family courts. During the passage of the Children Act, the Solicitor-General promised that at some stage he would come back to the House and report on the rolling programme that he has instituted to establish family courts. I believe that the Bill provides an excellent vehicle for a family court system, and I hope that we shall have some assurances in his winding-up speech that he will accept that.

I welcome the establishment of a legal ombudsman. I am concerned at the refusal of the Government and of some hon. Members to enable consumers, should they wish, to sue their advocates if they make a mess of cases. It is ludicrous that solicitors and barristers are immune from litigation if they do not conduct their cases properly.

In the past 10 years, Parliament has legislated for rights which cannot be enforced because citizens cannot pay. The legal aid system is in severe crisis. The Attorney-General has just returned to the Chamber. He will recall that on 12 February, when I initiated a debate on legal services, I pointed out to him that I would not like justice to be cash-limited—I referred to it as justice-capping. I gave him some figures which he has not countermanded today. In the past 10 years, 15 million people have lost the right to legal aid, and last year 8 per cent. fewer people were granted legal aid than in the year before and there was the second largest drop in use of the scheme from 1,700,054 to 994,066. There has been a 3 per cent. drop in the granting of civil aid certificates. The Attorney-General himself used the figures when he spoke about the percentage decline and the number of people eligible for legal aid.

At local authority level, law centres, advice centres, citizens advice bureaux and other agencies that provide necessary advice for local people are being squeezed.

Our system of justice does not exist merely to feed barristers and solicitors or to provide employment for court clerks. The courts and the professions exist to enable ordinary people to obtain justice. Justice must never be seen to be cost-effective, but it must be administered effectively. There is still genuine anger that the law is expensive both in time and money, inaccessible, favours the privileged, conducts itself in jargon, supports monopolies, is remote and is conducted by lawyers for lawyers. Our duty as legislators is to put an end to those excesses. That will not happen with this Bill, but given good will in Committee we may set out on the right road. I warn the House at this early stage that without the proper resources the journey will not even begin.

9.15 pm

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): I decline to follow my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) in his doom-laden and over-lugubrious approach to the Bill. I want every bit as much as he does to maintain an independent and strong Bar, which is the key to the Government's intention of providing more choice to the litigant. Without a strong and independent Bar, the litigant's choice will be diminished. With it, it will be enhanced.

Where I differ from the diagnosis of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton is that I believe that the Bar is robust enough to stand up to the extra measure of competition that the Bill will bring. Of all the professions, the Bar is probably the most competitive. There is competition to get good pupillages, competition to get into good sets of chambers, competition between sets of chambers and competition between members of chambers. The Bar is a robust profession and is well able to take care of itself.

However, I have one anxiety that is shared by many fellow barristers. It relates to the recruiting activities of the major City firms of solicitors. They are anxious to recruit the brightest and the best from the Bar, and they have deep pockets with which to do so. Indeed, they are already doing so to a considerable extent. When the Bill is enacted they will be in a position to recruit from the Bar in-house lawyers who will still be able to continue to practise in the High Court and the principal appellate courts. It will be more tempting for members of the Bar to leave and to join those firms.

That is a fear with some substance, but the approach of many at the Bar is too pessimistic. Although there are certainly advantages in being an in-house lawyer, there are also disadvantages and frustrations. The Bar will be able to surmount that competition and will continue to attract many of the best and brightest. I also foresee that many people who leave the Bar and join the large City firms as in-house lawyers will in time return to the Bar as independent practitioners.

A further anxiety about the Bill relates to contingency fees. It is crucial to the effective and efficient administration of justice that there is absolute trust between the judge and the advocate appearing before him or her. A barrister has a duty to the court which may conflict with the interests of his client. He has a duty to draw the judge's attention to cases that go against the argument being put forward. There is a duty to disclose documents that are unhelpful to the case. There is also a duty not to harass unduly or unfairly the witness who is being cross-examined.

My main anxiety about the contingency fees—I am glad that we are adopting the Scottish rather than the American system—is that, because the barrister's financial advantage is caught up to a much greater extent with the outcome of the case, there will be greater pressures brought to bear on our current high professional standards.

I believe that the Bar will be able to withstand those pressures, as will our friends the solicitor advocates who will be joining us before the High Court, the Court of Appeal and other appellate courts, but there are some risks in the Bill. Good reforming measures often carry risks. On the whole, the Bill is a good one and I commend it to the House.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): We have had a fair, critical and open-minded debate. There has been no difference about the Bill between the two sides of the House. The debate has not been dominated entirely by the legal profession, and there has been no unanimity between Labour and Conservative Members. In all, we have had a good, stimulating debate and the Bill has had a healthy start before it enters Committee.

The debate vindicates the Opposition's decision not to vote against Second Reading tonight. We support many parts of the Bill, but it was right for us to table a reasoned amendment, for which we will ask the House to vote. Our amendment fills out the frame for the Bill and provides performance standards by which we shall measure the way in which the Government provide both for the reform of the legal profession and for the access to law for people throughout the country.

The Bill cannot be described as having a single theme. On the one hand, it deregulates part of the profession, and on the other it introduces at least five quangos. It is a Bill for the English courts and the English legal profession.

Mr. Alex Carlile: And for the Welsh.

Mr. Fraser: And for the Welsh—I beg the hon. and learned hon. Gentleman's pardon. It is a Bill for the English and Welsh legal professions, and it was introduced by a Scots lawyer. This must be the first occasion on which legislation, in its early stages at any rate, has led to threatened industrial action by the judges and the threatened resignation of the Attorney-General.

With one hand, the Bill gives rights and opportunities for solicitors to become judges or have rights of audience in the higher courts, yet it almost takes those rights away with the other hand. In Committee we will want to consider the possibility of a single designated judge exercising a right of veto over the extension of the rights of audience. We want to get that balance right when we examine that matter in Committee.

The Bill reforms the courts system, but it does absolutely nothing about the obscurities surrounding the selection, training and appointments to the judiciary—and by judiciary I mean both the High Court and the magistrates bench. In the light of what the Attorney-General said in his opening remarks about equal opportunity and avoiding discrimination, it is even more important that we should open up that area of the legal profession to reform as well.

As I have said, we will not vote against Second Reading tonight, because there is a great deal in the Bill that we can support. However, we would have had a better Bill and the progress of legal reform and the reform of the courts would have been assisted if we had had such a debate a year ago, when the Government produced their Green Paper and then their White Paper. The quality of today's debate sustains the argument that this is the kind of subject on which the House should be consulted at a much earlier stage and on which we could have made a constructive non-party contribution to the development of policy. It is a pity that the House has come to the matter so late in the day.

What should be our attitude to the reform of the legal profession and the provision of services? I declare an interest, in that I am a lawyer. From time to time, we are not popular either as lawyers or as Members of Parliament, even among our colleagues until—as all hon. Members will be aware—someone actually wants advice. One is reasonably popular on those occasions, but one is not always universally popular at other times.

There is great danger in confusing qualifications with monopoly. Competition is not distorted by those who offer services being trained, having high standards and being competent to practise—indeed, rather the reverse. Competition is helped by having a common set of specifications and qualifications. Competition is distorted only when access to a qualification is not open to all, or when a qualification provides restricted entry to doing something for which it is not necessary to have the qualification at all, or when anti-competitive behaviour is imposed as a condition of holding the qualification—for instance, prohibitions on advertising and price display. There would have been less criticism of the professions if the Law Society and the Bar had revised their rules, particularly in respect of advertising and making information known about services provided, much earlier.

The trend of consumer protection has been in favour of tests of competence—for instance, the control of conduct of estate agents, house builders, insurance brokers, investment business, doctors, dentists, nurses, teachers and so on. It would be short-sighted if we were to reverse that process for lawyers, because their practice becomes more complicated all the time and demands more, not less, training and more qualifications. We meet the needs of the consumer if we make sure that people are properly qualified. We shall certainly want an even playing field and proper regulation when we deal with these matters in Committee.

Although protection of the consumer is important, it is not the only consideration when it comes to regulating legal services. There must also be an ethical commitment to an ideal of truth, trust and fairness, even if the lawyer suffers in the short term by obeying it. If the professional ethic is lost, in the long run the consumer will lose as well.

There are two classic examples, one of which will appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin). One occurs when a defence lawyer is asked to plead innocence of a crime to which the defendant has unambiguously confessed to the lawyer. Lawyers are constantly asked, "How can you defend somebody who has told you that he has done the crime?" Of course he cannot. The second example is not the defence lawyer but the prosecuting lawyer who suppresses evidence which, if made available to the defence, would lead to the acquittal of the defendant. Those are two examples in which the duty of the lawyer, whether to the client or to the state, must override the instructions that are given to him by the client. If he otherwise overcomes his professional scruples, he is in effect taking money to tell lies knowingly or to suppress the truth from the court or from his colleagues.

I mention those points not because I think that lawyers are particularly self-righteous or better than other professions. I do not think that they are. Many professions have an ethic. It is not right to say that, as a member of the legal profession, one treats these matters on a higher plane than people in other professions. I mention those points to underline the fact that one simply cannot have purely competitive, market, money-making considerations as the only basis for this legislation.

We do not want a Bill that will create injustice. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) mentioned that clause 85 will create a real injustice. At the moment, everybody knows that, if they have a claim for personal injury, with some exceptions the writ must be issued within three years. That is a certain period and it allows for a solicitor to have three months afterwards within which to serve the proceedings. Many people will suffer major injustice if clause 85 remains as drafted. When matters go to court, there will be arguments about whether service of the proceedings took place.

There are many examples. A company may change its registered offices and writs may be sent to the wrong place. There is a great possibility of creating uncertainty and injustice if clause 85 remains in the Bill. We shall return to that point in Committee.

The Bill gives new rights to conduct legal services, such as probate and conveyancing and, to a small extent, litigation. In Committee, we shall try to ensure that the Bill works even-handedly between practitioners, and follows the principle that independence of advice to the client should be preserved. There are too many temptations and imperfections for this matter to be left to market forces. My two examples have already been touched on. The first relates to probate. We do not oppose, the Law Society does not oppose and no one in the profession opposes in principle the extension of the ability of non-lawyers to take probate cases. If a bank or an insurance company has been appointed as an executor, it is right that it should be allowed to get probate itself, provided it is properly qualified to do so. However, at the moment, solicitors are under an external supervision in terms of the amount of money that they can charge for probate cases and it is well known that banks and insurance companies charge about three times as much for carrying out probate services.

In another place, the Government said that that matter should be left to the market, but we must remember whom we are talking about and the people who pay that three-times-higher bill, should that occur. First, those concerned will not be the executors of the will. They will not be in charge of the administration of the assets of the estate. Secondly, the original customer is dead—otherwise the will would not go to probate. Thirdly, those involved may well be widows or children who do not have any legal capacity. One cannot say that that class of consumer—on the one hand, the dead consumer and, on the other hand, the vulnerable consumer, who is perhaps a minor—will be properly protected by the operation of market forces. Although I do not oppose the provision in principle, there must be an appeal to a third-party authority about the level of charging because the scale of charges might have been fixed long after the testator made the will or even after the will has been probated.

My second example relates to conveyancing. Again, there is no opposition in principle, because Labour Members have been instrumental in widening the choice of conveyancing services, while maintaining standards of competence and behaviour. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) was not called to speak in the debate. If financial institutions carry out the conveyancing, the question that arises is whether they will perform that work primarily for the consumer's benefit or for their own. The problem is whether they will undertake what is known in other trades as "cherry picking"—that is, taking those parts of the work that are attractive and remunerative and leaving those that are unremunerative.

I shall summarise my point by considering the amounts of money involved in a conveyancing transaction. Let us assume that a house is sold for £100,000 and, for the sake of argument, that the conveyancing charges will be £500. In the same transaction, the commission for the sale of the house will be £2,000—about four times higher than the conveyancing fees. I repeat that we are talking about a financial institution that may earn £2,000 in commission for the sale of the property as opposed to about £500 in legal and conveyancing fees.

However, we must then add another factor. Let us assume that the property is sold on a mortgage of £60,000 backed by an endowment policy. The commission on that endowment policy might be worth about £1,000. Therefore, on the one hand, there is the consideration of making £3,000 in commission on the sale and the endowment and £500 for the so-called "independent" advice that is being given to the person undertaking the conveyance. Under those circumstances, one must consider whether, unless there are countervailing rules, completely independent advice will be given to the person undertaking the conveyance.

There is a simple way out of that, especially in relation to the endowment. As the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) has pointed out, it is reckoned that about £680 million per year is lost by people surrendering endowment policies that they would otherwise have been well advised to maintain. The answer probably lies in the Lord Chancellor exercising his powers to compel the financial institutions to disclose the commission that they receive as a result of the sale of an endowment policy. Solicitors have to do that now. They must not only disclose the amount but account for it to the customer. There must be an even playing field if we are to ensure that the first consideration, which is independent advice, is achieved and that there is fair competition between the professions.

The deficiencies in the Government's approach to these matters form the subject of our reasoned amendment. The first deficiency is the failure to deal with the inadequacy of legal aid. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) gave some telling figures. The truth of the matter is that, although expenditure on legal aid has increased during the past 10 years, in the past two or three years, the number of people who obtained legal aid advice and assistance has fallen off. More worryingly, there is now a falling off in the number of firms undertaking legal aid work. That has never happened before. The reason why it is happening is that the Government have geared the reward to people undertaking legal aid—both solicitors and barristers—at a figure well below the real costs and the inflation rate for conducting legal work.

The reward this year is about 7 per cent., compared with a real rate of inflation in legal costs and the costs of running a legal practice or barrister's practice of about 12 per cent. That has had a cumulative effect over the past few years. The consequence is that people are increasingly getting out of legal aid work. If we carry on giving third-class rates of reward to people who do legal aid work, we shall at least finish up with a second-class practice. That is not right. Access to the law and quality of representation should be commensurate with the case. The way in which legal aid has been drifting is militating against that.

The second deficiency in the Bill relates to the conduct of county courts. There was some attraction in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) that there should be competition between one county court and another. Indeed, there is some such competition. In some county courts, people submit voluntarily to their jurisdiction because they know that in court X an application under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 will be dealt with in seven days, whereas in court Y it will be dealt with in about six weeks or two months. There should perhaps be some competition between one county court and another.

The Government should think about a second practical matter—the difficulty of a litigant coming up against the same judge time and time again. In the High Court, at least there is the advantage that, unless one is unlucky, one will not get the same judge twice. Especially in country jurisdictions, there is often the possibility that, if either the advocate or litigant upsets the judge on one occasion, they will upset him on every subsequent occasion. That is a perfectly serious point. If we are to push more work down to the county courts, the judges should move around as well as the litigants.

Our greatest fear is that, on present performance, the Government are delegating work to a pretty ramshackle structure. I have just looked through a brief list of claims of maladministration against county court staff. It makes horrific reading. At Braintree county court, the list was overloaded and a case was adjourned. The same thing happened at Bromley county court and at Edmonton county court. At Exeter county court, the judge did not turn up. The registrar did not turn up at another county court. Cases have been incorrectly listed for a registrar —and so on.

Anyone who has any passing aquaintance with the operation of the county courts will be deeply worried about the standard of performance and the possibility of loading a huge amount of work on to a structure that cannot cope with the business now. The Attorney-General said that some staff would be released because the county courts will no longer operate payments systems. I am not sure that that change will operate to the advantage of some smaller litigants, who will say that they paid their money directly to the plaintiff. The bailiff will come in and find no independent record of whether money has been paid or not.

Our last criticism is that nothing in the Bill modernises except in the slightest detail, or makes transparent our system of recruiting, training and selecting the judiciary, or puts into statute any criteria for that exercise. That is in stark contrast to a Bill that sets out the criteria for the duties of the advisory committee.

The way in which judges and magistrates are selected or permitted to apply for the bench should be open and transparent and placed outside the control of political appointments. They should be the subject of the Judicial Appointments Group and take into consideration the elimination of prejudice or operation of discrimination through sex or race. As far as possible, the judges should reflect the composition of the community upon which they sit in judgment. These should not be secret matters, subject to political control. We were accused of trying to ensure political control of the appointment of judges, but we want to see that removed entirely from the political arena. I can think of one case in which the Prime Minister operated a political veto in respect of a judge's appointment.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) said, this is an enabling Bill, the final shape of which is not known. In our reasoned amendment, we try to sketch in a framework in which the change will take place and provide, in the course of our Committee discussions, for a comprehensive legal service in which the quality of and access to representation before the courts and tribunals are not dependent on wealth, privilege or advantage, but provide equal access to the law throughout the country. The Bill will not do that, which is why we have tabled our amendment. If our amendment is not passed, we shall try to achieve those goals in Committee.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): This has been an interesting and valuable debate with varied contributions from both sides of the House. If we had shut our eyes it would often have been difficult to know from which party or interest any particular contribution had come.

The Bill tackles and sets out to resolve major issues which have required attention for many years. The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) made a number of detailed comments which I look forward to taking up, considering and discussing further in Committee. The hon. Gentleman has a great deal of knowledge, having practised as a solicitor in London, and it has been a pleasure to work with him on previous Committees.

The comments made in the debate covered the key topics in the Bill. First, there is the civil justice review, which the Bill implements and which provides the first major structural reform of our system of civil justice since the judicature Acts of 1873. That aspect has been generally welcomed. The only point made about it was that it required adequate resourcing. That point has been firmly made by the Lord Chancellor and, in so far as it forms part of the criticisms underlying the Opposition's reasoned amendment, I shall return to it in detail later.

The second key aspect is the creation of a framework —I emphasise that word—to enable the structure of the legal profession to develop through a process of evolutionary change. That has been welcomed, but it was also questioned by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who asked how it would work in the Bill. It is important to emphasise that the Bill creates not the result, but the framework for producing the result. It will initially be a matter for the profession, or parts of the profession, or for other professions, to come forward with proposals which will be examined by the advisory committee under clauses 15 and 16, by the Lord Chancellor and by the judiciary, through the four senior designated judges. Their combined wisdom will come forward and their combined agreement will be necessary before changes can be made.

It must be recognised that the Bill follows years of difficulty, particularly between the two parts of the legal profession—barristers and solicitors—which has been to some extent reflected in the carefully considered arguments put forward from either side of the debate. It was evident that the arguments were advanced not from either side of the Chamber but from the two points of view. I think of the eloquent arguments on behalf of solicitors advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) and the eloquent arguments on behalf of barristers put forward by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). All those arguments were reflected in the responses of barristers and judges to the Green Papers—the "quality of justice"—and they will have to be combed through and evaluated by the professionals themselves in the first instance to see what kind of structure they come up with. It will then come to the Lord Chancellor and the judiciary for approval, or the lack of it, as the case may be. In that way, what has often been an agonising debate, which has properly been passionately discussed by those on both sides, should find a way of making progress, and a system which had not shown much capability of gentle evolution should find a way of effecting evolutionary change.

The third key point in the debate concerned the creation of a framework within which to encourage wider competition in conveyancing and probate services. The other sensible reforms relating to the appointment of the judiciary, allowing solicitors to make progress up the judiciary, judicial pensions, the power of the Law Society to regulate solicitors, and the extension of the jurisdiction of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to cover court staff were also mentioned. The extension of the commissioner's powers was widely welcomed, not least by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), one of the laymen who played a significant part in the debate—with his hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce).

In its major aspects, the Bill tackles problems that have been the subject of serious debate for as long as I have been in Parliament—almost 11 years—and for which there has been a growing need for resolution for all the 25 years I have been in practice as a barrister.

Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, I was taken aback to learn that the Opposition appeared to be seeking to oppose the Bill as a matter of principle, but it has become clear from the speeches of the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and of the hon. Member for Norwood that the Opposition do not oppose the Bill itself but are putting down a marker with regard to two aspects of it—resources for the county court, and legal aid—by means of their reasoned amendment.

First, I wish to rebut as strongly as I can the comment by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon that legal aid is withering on the vine. That is nonsense. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman's party left office, legal aid was being funded to the tune of £119 million per year. It is funded now at about £589 million—almost a fivefold increase in value and about 150 per cent. over and above inflation. That can hardly be described as withering on the vine. Nor do I refer to monetary value alone. The aspects of legal aid which are important to this Bill include the fact that the number of civil legal aid certificates has increased from 190,000 10 years ago to 259,000 today—an increase of about 30 per cent. That is a picture of steady growth.

The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon and the hon. Member for Norwood criticised the Lord Chancellor because he has set in train a review of legal aid, coupled with the careful administrative review that the Legal Aid Board is carrying out, and because he is seeking how best to target the money on legal aid. That is not a matter for criticism. It is a matter of good government. I do not know what impression the Opposition wish to give the country about legal aid. I have peeped into their policy review to see what they say. [Interruption.] I see the hon. Member for St. Helens, South scowling. He would no doubt wish nobody to look into that document and probably shrinks from looking at it himself. It states:

> "Over time and as resources become available we intend consistently to improve access to legal aid."

That is the kind of general statement which will thrill everyone in Knowsley.

The realistic step to take is exactly that which the Lord Chancellor is taking—to look carefully at where best to deploy the money. As he has said, he will not wait three years to come forward with sensible proposals—he will introduce them as and when his scrutiny throws them up. I remind the House that as recently as 9 April the reforms that the Lord Chancellor announced in November came into effect. Under those reforms, children's means are to be assessed separately from those of their parents, pensioners dependent on a small capital nest egg will get additional protection and all litigants in personal injury cases will have the benefit of an increase in the upper limit. That will help many people to gain better access to legal aid.

Mr. George Howarth: Will the Solicitor-General give way?

The Solicitor-General: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I have several points to answer and not much time in which to do so.

The Opposition have argued the need for adequate resources for the county courts. The Lord Chancellor has recognised that there have been problems in the county courts. The hon. Member for Norwood scratched around his notes to pull together some rather disparate problems from individual county courts. I do not deny that those problems exist or that there may be more, but the Government are tackling them. Expenditure is being increased. The Lord Chancellor has made it clear that the civil justice reforms will come in stages and not before the courts are ready.

The number of circuit judges has increased steadily from 353 five years ago to 408 now. That is a significant increase. As a result of the last autumn statement, the number of staff in post is to increase by 350 this year to carry out the administrative work of the courts. This year there are to be up to an additional 100 staff for the civil justice review and the Children Bill, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). The need to handle suitor's cash will be ended. It may lead to one or two difficulties, but it is a sensible way to relieve county court staff of a job which plantiffs and defendants can do better themselves. That will release some 350 staff for other work. The summons production centre at Northampton is imaginative thinking. Large users of the county court can issue summonses, which some do in large quantities, highly efficiently. That will result in a saving of 50 staff.

Under present administrative procedures some 1,500 trials a year come down from the High Court to the county court and are handled by 50 trial centres. In my early days in the county court, if a case went over more than one day, one would stand back and go away for three to five weeks. Cases dribbled on for months. That will not happen. An additional 25 trial centres are in the pipeline. That is the proper and, dare I say it, the Conservative way to manage the system, to get it working better so as to meet the needs of the day.

I want to try to answer one or two points raised in the debate. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) spoke as a layman, and laymen are to play an important part in the advisory committee where they are to have a majority. It is in the interests of the public and users of legal services that the reforms are rightly being brought forward. My right hon. Friend made three points about probate, mortgages and tied practitioners. The answer to his point on probate is that at the moment there are no provisions for the administration of estates after grant of probate because there are none in the present law. The Government have improved the position by introducing a complaint system to cover such matters, which my right hon. Friend will find in clauses 46 and 47. Clause 39 enables the Lord Chancellor, if appropriate, to make regulations on accounting for commissions. The financial services regime deals with tied practitioners, but we shall have an opportunity in Committee to consider how that works in practice in relation to the providers of mortgages.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins) asked why we do not let any case go to the High Court. Here again it is a question of proper management of resources. There will no longer be any upper limit in the county court. If one let any case go to the High Court, the great temptation for the client would be to say that his was a terribly important case and that if it could go to the High Court it should. That would be a wasteful use of resources.

My hon. Friend also asked about employed lawyers and why they should not have to abide by the cab rank rule. It is impractical to think that an employed lawyer carrying out work for his employer in a particular area can in any realistic sense hold himself open to all comers. He would become an employed solicitor. We must hold that position open.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central was worried about wasting money on issuing writs. I understand the point because I was involved in that debate long before I was a member of the Government. There has always been a problem about whether to clamp down on the length of time available in which to start proceedings and get them up and running or whether to get them moving. There has been a consistent complaint that cases have hung around for three years, the writ is then issued and the next year has dribbled by. To answer a point made by the hon. Member for Norwood, that period will come down to four months. Writs will have to be issued and served and proceedings got under way. After several years of complaints, we believe that that will be a wise approach, but we can discuss that further in Committee.

The Bill lays the ground for major reforms to our system of civil justice. It opens the way to a balanced, carefully thought out evolutionary development of our legal profession. It provides a structure for properly controlled development of competition in conveyancing. After years of debate and not a little anguish, the Bill will come to be seen as a landmark in the sensible, evolutionary Conservative approach to reform and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Courts and Legal Services Bill [Lords] [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Courts and Legal Services Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

  (i) any sums required by the Lord Chancellor for the payment of grants under the Act to the Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct and the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board;

  (ii) any other expenses incurred by the Lord Chancellor under the Act; and

  (iii) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money provided by Parliament under any other enactment;

(b) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums to be paid out of that Fund under any other enactment.—[Mr. Lilley.]

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): It is, perhaps, entirely appropriate that a non-lawyer should speak on this Bill via the money resolution, because the Bill has been —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will those hon. Members who are not remaining for this debate please leave the Chamber quietly?

Mr. Mitchell: I have never seen so many lawyers working so hard for so little and at such length, which is why I am speaking on the money resolution. The Bill has provoked a protracted matrimonial dispute between the Law Society and the Bar Council. I am concerned with the consumers' point of view, which arises under the money resolution because its provisions do not cover the Lord Chancellor's increased expenditure and expenditure under related legislation, such as the extension of the ombudsman role.

The real problem of the inadequate provision of legal services is financial. The system seriously fails the people —not the wealthy who can always afford to pay for legal services, but the mass of the people who need the backing of the law in employment rights, housing matters, domestic and matrimonial disputes and so on.

All those issues are fairly inexpensive and of no great interest to the legal profession because there is little reward in them. However, they require the adequate provision of services so that people can have their rights protected. That is where both the money resolution and the Bill fall down. The provisions of the money resolution are inadequate to extend the services that we want to those in society who are currently badly served by the administration of justice. They require a department—a Ministry of Justice—answerable in the Chamber. They require a public defender service providing effective protection for the mass of the people. They require a legal services commission. They require proper training, in particular for judges, which is covered in the money resolution. I do not know why we have not yet established a YTS-type training scheme for judges. Under our system we have some of the worst-trained judges in the world. Certainly we have nothing like the provision for training of judges as exists in France. Finally, they require the type of injury compensation scheme that exists in New Zealand.

Instead, the Lord Chancellor has gone for the market solution to try to get more work out of the system for less money. He has gone for a money resolution that covers less ground. A market solution—increased competition —makes fewer demands on the public purse and gets more work out of the system. I have no objection to that as a principle, but it does not cover enough ground. The money resolution is not as extensive as I would have wanted it to be.

I congratulate the Lord Chancellor on the Bill, first for having begun progress after the logjam which built up under his predecessors and secondly for the ingenious solutions that he has gone in for. However, there are other areas in which we could serve the consumer better without making substantial demands on the money resolution— for instance, by making barristers and lawyer advocates in the higher court liable in law for incompetence, negligence and inadequacy. Why should they be exempt from legal action of that nature? No one else has that protection. We need to bring them into the scope of negligence cases and they should be taken to court for inadequacy in their work.

The money resolution covers the extra work of judges, but the extra work that falls on them in respect of their control over access to representation in higher courts is not something that they should have to do in any case.

Why should judges, who made their views on solicitor representation in higher courts absolutely clear, and who are defending the vested interests of barristers in this matter, have power over that area? Why not allow solicitors to operate in the higher courts on the same basis as we now allow lay people to operate in the county courts? It could be as simple as that. It would not need the expenditure in the money resolution if we opted for that more straightforward solution and then let the consumer choose whose services he wanted to represent him.

We could also get a wider range of representation by providing that the solicitor who prepared the case could present it in the court. That could be done without extra expenditure, thus widening the range of choice. If we maintain the ban on those who prepare cases representing them in court we are imposing a rule that does not apply in the lower courts, and it is wholly unnecessary.

We could have direct access to barristers. I am alarmed to find that the Bar Council has taken preliminary steps to discipline barristers who work in solicitors' firms. Why can we not establish a principle of direct access to barristers?

The cab rank principle was put into the Bill by Lord Alexander to restrict competition among solicitors in the higher courts or, as the Legal Action Group put it, "to make mischief". Really it is there as a restraint on competition, because it is difficult for solicitors to comply with that ruling. I shall quote briefly from the Legal Action Group's current report:

> "The Bar's own cab-rank rule does not bear too much investigation. Only from last month has this vaunted bulwark of the country's civil liberties actually required a barrister to act in a legally aided case. The exceptions to the general principle remain so wide that any barrister could devise a justification for refusing almost any particular case or general class of work."

The editorial concludes that the real issue is to ensure that > "every client should have access to a solicitor, not that every solicitor must act in every case."

[Mr. Mitchell]

The money resolution covers the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board. I am concerned that the board will effectively cover only the work of banks and building societies. There is a different rule-making system through the Law Society for solicitors and a different system again through the Council for Licensed Conveyancers for licensed conveyancing. As a result of the separation of powers, there will be three rule-makers. It will be difficult to achieve a level playing field and a system that ensures that each operates under the same rules and competes on the same basis. The way that the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board will operate will be inadequate.

The money resolution will cause extra expenditure for courts. The Government's views on the proposals of the civil justice review have not been clarified.

The Bill makes some welcome changes, particularly in respect of debts. I welcome them because the procedures have been too automatic and abrupt and the consumer has had too little power in them. However, I am not sure how it will work in practice. The civil justice review made 91 recommendations. We need to know what the Government's response will be before we can adequately judge how much expenditure will be involved and what regulations will follow to implement the provisions of the Bill. When will the Government give their considered response to those 91 recommendations, many of which affect expenditure under the money resolution? The problem of debt will increase the more the current deflation bites. To know how those procedures will operate, we must be aware of the Government's position.

The legal services ombudsman will have an expanded role, but we are not sure how he will function. He needs to have power to deal with shoddy and inadequate work and negligence. There is a provision in the Bill that all procedures must be exhausted before there is recourse to the ombudsman, whose expenditure is covered by the money resolution. The previous procedures under the Solicitors Complaints Bureau were not satisfactory because it had no power to award compensation. Will it be given power to do so and will the Government table an amendment to enable that, because it will have an effect on the number of cases that come before the legal services ombudsman?

The money resolution is wide-ranging, which is why this has been a rather more wide-ranging speech than it would have been. It embraces the least adequate part of the Bill. The Bill is good because it enhances competition and therefore enhances the drive of legal services to serve the consumer. But that is not enough, and we still need wider provisions and the correction of various parts of the Bill, which I hope will be made in Committee. We want to establish the basic principle that the legal system is a service industry working to serve the people, particularly the consumer of legal services, rather than the self-interest of those who operate it.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I am grateful for this opportunity at the end of our main debate to speak to the money resolution. I suppose that the House should be grateful that we have not been pressed for time today in debating the Bill. Indeed, we could have examined the statement made earlier by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in much more detail and every hon. Member who wanted to speak on Second Reading of the Bill could still have done so. It is gratifying to know that those of us who were concerned that there should be proper examination of the statement were proved right. In view of the Government's track record of incompetence and shambolic action in the past week, it behoves the House on every available opportunity to examine what the Government are doing. That is what we are doing on this money resolution.

I do not cavil at the Attorney-General's claim that there is a need for speedier hearings of cases in civil courts. The Government say that that can be achieved by transferring cases from the High Court to the county courts, and I believe that that is probably right. However, the amount of money that the Government have allocated for that, including judicial salaries, ranges from £1·6 million to £2·1 million for the first three years. The Government also point out that there could be a bulge in activity in the courts which will be incorporated within a maximum figure of £3 million in the first year, £4·5 million in the second year and £5 million in the third.

Ministers should explain to the House the basis for those figures, which are included in the explanatory memorandum at the beginning of the Bill. We are anxious that adequate resources should be available to ensure that the transfer is made speedily and effectively so that there can be adequate access to the county courts for people who, as several hon. Members who declared their interests as lawyers said, complain about cost and delays. Those are the two principal complaints about legal issues. I hope that the Solicitor-General can assure the House that the amount of money provided is adequate and that the calculations have been made very carefully.

The idea of an ombudsman for legal services is good. The difficulties of complaining about barristers are legion. There has always been a qualification that people might seek to reopen a case if they complain about a barrister's negligence and sue in tort for that negligence. That has always been a difficulty.

The Law Society has probably been the body most effective at protecting its members rather than the general public when complaints are made. As one might expect, the Law Society's rules for dealing with complaints about solicitors are highly complicated and normally require a solicitor to interpret them to the luckless person who believes that he has been badly dealt with. In my experience of constituents who have made complaints, a general system of supervision by an ombudsman is likely to yield better results more effectively and more quickly than the turbid and complicated rules laid down by the Law Society, which has a vested interest in maintaining those rules.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the ombudsman be a lawyer?

Mr. Cryer: That is not absolutely clear.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): He is not allowed to be a lawyer.

Mr. Cryer: I am informed from a sedentary position that the ombudsman will not be a lawyer.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Will my hon. Friend give us an example of the complicated rules about making a complaint?

Mr. Cryer: One of my constituents felt that his case had been mishandled by a solicitor, and wrote to the Law Society and obtained a copy of its rules. We went through the rules extremely carefully and found that he had very little basis for a complaint. That left him feeling dissatisfied. He had the bones of a case, but after an exhaustive search we were not able to proceed. That was my constituent's experience. As a result, I had to drag my eyes through the Law Society's list of rules, which I found to be extremely complicated. Rules to be used for facilitating complaints should be as straightforward as possible so as to encourage justified complaints.

Legal education will cost about £750,000 in the first year. The provision for legal education and conduct is welcome because legal education seems unnecessarily chaotic. It is only relatively recently, for example, that polytechnics have started to run courses to qualify solicitors. I refer to courses such as the common professional entrance exam in which, in effect, an ordinary degree can be converted to a law degree to allow entrance to the Law Society finals. I hope that the money will be well spent [illegible] clarify the legal position and also to encourage the sons and daughters of working men and women to become solicitors and barristers.

For many years, entry—certainly to the barristers' occupation—has been too expensive for many families to contemplate, despite the fact that in the past 10 or 15 years scholarships of one kind or another have been introduced.

Mr. Alex Carlile: That is mythology.

Mr. Cryer: I inform the hon. and learned Gentleman that for many families entry into the barrister's occupation represents a potential financial burden that they cannot accept with equanimity. Of course, under the Government, the general position with fees has not helped at all.

According to the financial memorandum, the overall annual cost of the Bill will be about £5 million, rising to £6·5 million. That includes money payable for judicial salaries. I am sorry that the Bill does not tackle the difficult problem with our judiciary. The judiciary is appointed to be independent so that the arms of the Executive and of the judiciary are not merged and so that the Executive cannot warp the law. That is the theory, but it does not work out very well in practice.

One problem is that judges are often ignorant and arrogant and cannot easily be removed from office except by a joint address of both Houses of Parliament. That means that some judges—I cannot name them because Members, as elected representatives, cannot even comment on judges, such is the insulation of their position—make statements about cases on which they have made decisions. Months later, they refer back to previous cases in which they have made decisions of horrifying indifference to some of the circumstances. By going on the media in the full glare of publicity and referring to previous cases, they resurrect the case on which they commented previously, which brings back the full horror of the first occasion to the family concerned.

Mr. Skinner: That is Pickles.

Mr. Cryer: Yes, quite often judges make thoughtless comments. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was absolutely right to mention Judge Pickles. Judges say, "I can't be sacked, I must carry out my duties and I believe that they include commenting on cases as I choose." The Lord Chancellor has expressed general criticism of Judge Pickles' comments and, in a letter to me, he has also expressed great concern. The Government must tackle the problem of maintaining some independence for the judiciary, while providing a better way of ensuring that judges conform to some reasonable rules, which includes preventing them from commenting freely on judicial decisions that they themselves have made and producing the harm that I have described.

Judges who feel that they are better in a television studio can abandon their jobs and go full-time as commentators or do some sort of comedy turn.

Mr. Skinner: Pickles could be on a panel game.

Mr. Cryer: Indeed. Judges should not persist in retaining their judicial function if that causes difficulties for people who are brought before them and for their families.

I realise that there are difficulties, but this matter should be tackled in Committee. There should be some warning to the as yet handful of the judiciary who behave with complete impunity to all pleadings from the rest of the judicial establishment. The Lord Chancellor says that he can do nothing. I understand that if a judge comments in the fashion that I have described the practice is for him to be sent off to some provincial circuit with uncomfortable lodgings where it is drafty and nasty.

Mr. Skinner: It cannot be too bad.

Mr. Cryer: My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover queries what I am saying. I am told that that is the way in which judges are brought into some sort of conformity, but it is not working. It is fair to comment on that fact in relation to the money resolution, which deals with salaries paid from the Consolidated Fund. Indeed, they are paid from the Consolidated Fund so that there can be no taint of Government money being paid direct to the judiciary in recognition of its so-called "independent" position.

In conclusion, I hope that the Solicitor-General has been suitably briefed on the money resolution because it is an important part of our scrutiny and, as I said earlier, with the Government's sorry record of incompetence, we have to seize every opportunity to ensure that that scrutiny is maintained.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): The money resolution has proved an opportunity for a wide-ranging addition to the debate that we enjoyed before 10 o'clock.

The key provisions in the Bill in relation to the money resolution are in parts I and II, which take forward the recommendations of the civil justice review and the Government's proposals concerning the provision of legal services. As the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has rightly said, part I is expected to give rise to additional annual expenditure increasing from £1·6 million to £2·1 million for the first three years. Such costs should be essentially transitional, representing the need to increase both judicial and administrative capacity in certain parts of the system—principally in the county courts—which will, in the main, be offset over time as a result of revised and streamlined procedures. As I said in the Second Reading debate, it is, however, estimated that there will be a continuing need for around 50 additional staff in the longer term to strengthen the listing arrangements in trial centres, which will be where the new work will in the main be dealt with.

This is, of course, separate from the additional provision announced in the autumn statement last year, which will enable the Lord Chancellor to increase the numbers of staff in the courts by about 350 to take account of recent increases in the work load.

Judicial salaries are paid from the Consolidated Fund, but those of registrars, who will be retitled "district judges" as a result of the Bill, are paid from the Lord Chancellor's Vote. The increase in numbers of the judiciary required in connection with part I will be predominantly at the "district judge" level. All the expenditure relating to this part—including the transitional bulge in legal aid expenditure referred to in the financial memorandum and caused by the faster throughput of business—is therefore expected to fall under the head at paragraph (a)(iii) in the money resolution.

Part II of the Bill sets out the new framework for the provision of legal services and establishes the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee for legal education and conduct, the legal services ombudsman and the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board, together with its associated ombudsman scheme and appeal tribunals. The cost of all these bodies—which will pave the way to enable the provision of legal services to become less restrictive, while maintaining standards and public confidence in those providing them—may be taken into account at paragraph (a)(i) and (ii) in the money resolution. However, it is intended that the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board and the conveyancing ombudsman should in time become self-financing through fees.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who unfortunately must be elsewhere engaged—

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): He is doing an interview on Sky television.

The Solicitor-General: —welcomed the new scheme for the legal services onbudsman. He asked whether the legal services ombudsman had power to award compensation. The answer is that he has power to recommend compensation but not to enforce it. To enable him to enforce it would effectively make him another sort of court, whereas he is intended to be a different type of scrutineer. Publicity, which would no doubt appeal to the hon. Gentleman, is a considerable weapon in enforcing this type of ombudsman's decision.

In order not to keep hon. Members from some clearly entertaining material, I conclude my remarks on the money resolution and commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Wrightington Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

10.41 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I welcome the opportunity given to me by Mr. Speaker to raise the problems caused by the waiting lists at Wrightington hospital in my constituency and within the West Lancashire health authority which is almost coterminous with my constituency.

Before I enter into the arguments on the matter, I pay tribute to the dedicated staff and doctors at the two main hospitals which make up West Lancashire health authority —Wrightington hospital and Ormskirk district and general hospital. In the past 12 months we have been granted £25 million by the North Western regional health authority to build a new hospital. I am pleased to say that it is now under construction. My hon. Friend the Minister for Health recently visited West Lancashire to cut the sod to start building the new hospital.

The purpose of the debate is to draw attention to the problems of orthopaedic surgeons at Wrightington hospital. Waiting lists in West Lancashire health authority are low compared with national averages. That is a tribute to the staff. However, the position of the orthopaedic side, particularly upper limb, is extremely bad. It is acute and needs to be brought to the attention of the House. Action must be taken to deal with this problem.

The major problem arises from the waiting list of Mr. John Stanley, the upper limb surgeon. He is in need of additional support. The problem arises because Wrightington hospital is a regional centre of excellence. It draws patients from all over the country. During the past 12 months, 94 district health authorities have referred patients there. It is one of those hospitals that has been in the forefront of orthopaedic surgical technique developments and has played a major part in the development of hip replacement surgery for people afflicted with arthritis. That has become an operation that is widely carried out throughout the Health Service, and much of the work on it was pioneered at Wrightington.

Wrightington is also a centre of excellence for rheumatology and contains one of the small units in the north-west which deal with rheumatology in children. In recent years, the rheumatology ward at Wrightington has been the subject of debate in this House. I am pleased that, due to the attitude of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) when she was a Minister, that institution continues to supply a good service to the people of the north-west.

At present, there are 1,660 patients awaiting admission to Wrightington hospital. Of those, 1,065 have been waiting six months or more. Of those, 791 patients are on Mr. John Stanley's list for upper limb surgery. His difficulty is that he is one of six specialist upper limb surgeons practising, particularly on hands and arms, in the United Kingdom. Of his patients, 568 have been waiting for six months, and 427 for more than 12 months.

Therefore, the problem has existed for some time. When the Department of Health recently analysed the worst 100 waiting lists in the country, Wrightington's list came 58th. It was hoped, at that time, both by the district health authority and me, that the announcement by the Department of Health in the White Paper "Working for Patients" that 100 new consultants would be created would result in Wrightington receiving a consultant to alleviate its problems.

The North Western regional health authority absorbs about 9 per cent. of the total national expenditure on health care. But an examination of the number of consultants who had been appointed by the Department, following the undertaking in "Working for Patients", found that only six had been appointed to the north-west —less, on a global examination of the position, than would be expected according to the number of patients and the volume of NHS resources absorbed by the North Western region.

Today, the NHS treats more patients, with more staff, than ever before. It is a demand-led system. Resources have to be placed at the points where the pressure arises and demand is greatest. Wrightington falls into that category. Since 1985-86, the number of patients treated at Wrightington has slowly increased, from 2,305 in 1985-86 to 2,715 in 1989-90—an increase of more than 400 in discharges. But in 1985-86, the number of patients who had been on the waiting list for 12 months or more was 218; in 1989-90, it was 628. Therefore, despite the fact that more patients are being treated, the number on the waiting lists is increasing.

That is a tribute to the success of Wrightington and to the ability of the doctors there to provide excellent service —but it is making matters more difficult. Ministers in the Department of Health have tried to lessen the problem by means of the waiting list initiative. We are grateful that in 1987-88 another 250 patients were allowed operations because of the increased resources from that initiative. The comparable figures for 1988-89 were 120, and for 1989-90, 140.

However, despite consideration by the Department and its clear understanding that the problem needs tackling, the waiting lists continue to grow. It appears that Wrightington is a victim of its own success. If the problem continues, the waiting lists will only grow.

An application has been made to the Department under the so-called Yates initiative, whereby the Government determine whether waiting lists can be reduced by providing funds to hospitals centrally. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will look with some sympathy at our application for £235,000 to carry out more operations so as to reduce the waiting list.

It is impossible to discuss the waiting lists in one hospital without also considering the district health authority as a whole. West Lancashire district health authority has two major hospitals—the district hospital at Ormskirk, where a new hospital is being built, and Wrightington itself.

Over the past 12 months the formula by which the regions are funded by the Department has been changed. As a result, West Lancashire health authority has received a budget increase of 6.5 per cent. in the past year. That is made up of amounts of 5·8 per cent. and 0·7 per cent., the latter being a non-recurring sum.

I am sure that my hon. Friend will make the point that the retail prices index and health pay and prices costs are not necessarily one and the same, because the RPI contains some elements that are not relevant to pay and prices in the Health Service, such as mortgage interest rates, and so on. But some aspects of health costs, especially those relating to drugs, have risen in price well above the rate of inflation. So the district health authority, those who take an interest in health in the area and I all believe that 6·5 per cent. is not enough. If it is implemented, it will unfortunately entail a reduction in the health authority's resources over the coming years.

The change in the formula, as it has affected the North Western region, worries me. Unless it is reconsidered, we shall face the same problem next year, and the year after. This year the problem has been concealed, to some extent, by the large increase in the NHS budget generally, but the same formula for determining increases will apply next year. The North Western region's morbidity rate is extremely high, and the formula has been changed to the detriment of the region. If the Department were to look into that, it would benefit the health authorities in the region, which is the second biggest in the country.

When my hon. Friend does his calculations for Wrightington and examines the health authority's problems, I ask him to consider the performance of West Lancashire district health authority over the past few years. It is a model of financial rectitude and has followed Government guidelines time and time again. Over the past five years it has increased the number of patients it treats by 20 per cent. and has never overspent its budget. Unlike other district health authorities which have closed wards when they have overspent to reduce costs, West Lancashire has never called on that requirement, although major structural changes have been made as small cottage hospitals have been closed, such as Greenlane—Brandreth is planned for the future—to centralise treatment in Ormskirk, which is the geographical centre of the district, in modern facilities that are being built.

The cost improvements asked for by the regional health authority and the Department have always been delivered, but a small authority which covers 120,000 patients who are served by the hospitals within its environs has its limits. There is a deep feeling, particularly among the members of the district health authority, that overspenders benefit, while they have done everything that they have been called on to do.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to look at all those factors when he considers West Lancashire health authority, particularly at the morbidity ratio and the changes in the formula that will affect the North Western region as a whole and West Lancashire in particular. I again impress on him that the service at Wrightington will be a demand-led service of excellence. It is recognised throughout the country as second to none. It is demanded and will continue to be demanded by the public. The consultants who are doing such a good job deserve the support not only of their colleagues on the district health authority, but of Members of the House and the Government as a whole. I hope that my hon. Friend will look with sympathy on the difficult task that they face, perhaps with a view to helping to alleviate those problems while improving the service to patients.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Roger Freeman): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on presenting a case on behalf of his constituents with his customary clarity and courtesy.

It is nice to see you back in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, after your visit to New Zealand. I understand that you and your wife were able to combine it with a few days holiday. I hope that you enjoyed your holiday and that your official visit was a great success.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Freeman: My hon. Friend concentrated his remarks principally on Wrightington hospital, which is just without his constituency boundaries. He would want me to say that our hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) represents the constituency that includes Wrightington. I understand that a good proportion of the staff and patients must come from my hon. Friend's constituency. It is part of the West Lancashire health authority, to which I pay tribute for achieving significant improvements in health care over the past six years. Indeed, my hon. Friend will be interested to know that the most recent accurate statistics for 1982 to 1987-88 show in-patient admissions up 22 per cent., out-patient treatments up 33 per cent. and day cases, principally day case surgery, up 60 per cent. It is interesting that treatment of patients in the trauma and orthopaedics specialty increased by 29 per cent. between 1982 and 1988-89. Those are truly remarkable figures which are a tribute to the skill, dedication and hard work of the staff.

Trauma and orthopaedic work, in which my hon. Friend is particularly interested tonight, includes broken limbs, hip and knee replacements and investigations into chronic arthritic conditions.

I understand that, last year, some 3,730 patients in west Lancashire were treated for trauma and orthopaedic conditions requiring hospital treatment compared with 2,880 in 1982—a significant increase. One understands that the population is aging and that the pressure for orthopaedic care is consequently increasing, and that technological advances, particularly the modern marvel of the hip replacement, which my hon. Friend and I, if we ever reach a great age, may well be candidates for, make possible surgery that was not dreamed of by our parents, let alone our grandparents.

My hon. Friend referred to the visit to Ormskirk of my hon. Friend the Minister for Health to kick-start a piece of construction equipment preparing the site for the new hospital—a £25 million development, with 139 beds for medical and general surgery, 23 for children and 8 for intensive therapy patients, and a modern accident and emergency department. I am sure that my hon. Friend is looking forward to the completion of that project, which will be of great value to the people of Lancashire.

My hon. Friend referred to the revenue allocation for west Lancashire, and I was busily trying to calculate the figures as he spoke. For the record, it is important to note that, for the year 1989-90, the year that has just ended, I calculate that the authority received some £25,310,000, made up of £24,568,000, to which was added AIDS money of £165,000, growth or development money of £379,000 and a number of other miscellaneous items totalling £198,000. The record should also show that, in the year to come, the allocation is £27,051,000, to which should be added an allocation for AIDS, certain White Paper work and capital charge preparation of some £200,000, giving a total of £27,251,000. I make that an increase of about £2 million, or 8 per cent.

I would not argue with my hon. Friend about the precise mathematics, but when we start moving in 1991-92 to full and proper weighted capitation, I believe that, from advice that I have received, albeit provisional, my hon. Friend's district will be a gainer, presumably reflecting the fact that either the population is forecast to increase and/or demographic factors will move in favour of his constituents—that is, if their average age is particularly high in comparison with the rest of the region, or if their relative health is such that the district merits a greater allocation of funds. The provisional signs are that my hon. Friend's district will benefit.

I understand that Wrightington hospital has located within it a regional specialty service for joint replacements, including upper limb, hip and knee replacements. One associates the hospital with the late Professor Sir John Charnley, who, even to a relative layman such as myself, is well known for his pioneering work on hip replacements.

It is relevant to note that, of the 942 hip replacements carried out in 1988-89, 34 per cent. were for patients living outside the north-western region. My hon. Friend quoted a slightly different figure, but it made the same point, that on orthopaedic work the hospital is serving a broad area.

The service deals with the lion's share of complex rheumatoid cases for the whole of the north-west and Mersey regions, and provides the only service for those two regions for wrist replacement and 90 per cent. of elbow replacements. It provides the only wrist surgery service in Great Britain, so it is not surprising that the hospital is facing a growing demand for surgery that is reflected in the activity figures for that specialty and in the waiting lists.

Over the past four years, patient activity has increased from 2,232 cases in 1986-87 to 2,715 in 1989-90—an increase of 22 per cent. At the same time, the number of patients coming forward for treatment has increased at an even faster rate. One understands the reasons—the hospital's reputation and the increase in the aging population.

The increase has been so fast that the number of patients waiting for more than 12 months increased from 339 in 1986-87 to 628 in 1989-90. At 1 March, 628 patients had been waiting for more than one year. My hon. Friend drew my attention to the fact that 427 patients are on Mr. Stanley's list for upper limb surgery.

Wrightington hospital has met all the efficiency targets set for it by the region. Last year, a target baseline figure of 2,304 treatments was set, and 2,715 were achieved. The irony is that, the better and more successful a hospital is at treating patients, the more likely it is to run up against cash constraints imposed by the current funding system.

My hon. Friend knows that, from April 1991 onwards, the new regime will benefit the hospital in two ways. First, there will be a contracting system whereby, if patients are referred from outside to a hospital of such distinction, money will follow those patients. The hospital's budget will become more flexible to the extent that, the more that it can attract patients from outside its district, the more money will flow into it. Secondly, our new system of allocating funds on the basis of weighted capitation should work in favour of districts where demographic and relative health factors indicate the necessity of allocating further funds.

Mr. Hind: Is my hon. Friend aware that the consultants at Wrightington hospital have expressed interest in becoming a self-governing trust because, as my hon. Friend pointed out, it is in their interests to do so? That change could be of some help to them in the future.

Mr. Freeman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing that interesting fact to my attention. If we receive Parliament's permission to proceed with the initiative, we do not expect that the hospitals and other units announced this summer will comprise the full and definitive list. If Wrightington is not in the first wave, in the fullness of time we expect that it, together with all other establishments having the proper qualifications, will be included in what will be an experiment of great value to hospitals throughout the country.

My hon. Friend referred to our inability to allocate an extra consultant to Wrightington hospital. It would not be helpful or constructive if I sought to justify that action. Suffice it to say that that decision was made by the Department and not individually by Ministers, which was the right way to proceed. We received twice as many bids as there were available consultants, so we were to some extent constrained by the number of qualified senior doctors able to become consultants. However, I understand my hon. Friend's specific point concerning the need for additional help in respect of upper limb surgery, which I shall bring to the attention of my Department's officials. I had not fully appreciated the point that my hon. Friend made.

I may be able to give my hon. Friend some further encouragement in respect of the hospital's waiting list. Over the past three years, we sought to concentrate waiting list moneys on reducing the number of patients waiting for operations for more than 12 months. That was our top priority. We know that such patients numbered 628.

I understand that the region has allocated some £431,000 to the district health authority over the past three years to treat 761 more trauma and orthopaedic patients, 500 of whom will be at Wrightington. In 1990-91, some £77,400 is being allocated to Wrightington as bridging money until Mr. Yates and his team make up their minds about any further allocation of funds to the hospital. That money will permit another 45 knee or hip operations, and another 25 upper limb operations.

John Yates looks after a special fund: £12 million has been set aside to be allocated nationally, following an examination of all the waiting lists in every district specialty by the management team from the inter-authority comparisons and consultancy unit, led by Mr. Yates. The valuable work started by the team in 1989 will continue this year. I understand that it is now considering a bid from the district for some £232,000 to carry out 135 more knee and hip replacement operations and 75 more upper limb operations, and I know that it will consider the bid very carefully.

It will take full account of the specialist nature of the work undertaken, and will know that the management executive led by Duncan Nichol is taking a particular interest in the number of hip replacements to be achieved in the North Western region this year. I understand that the team will meet the district chairman and managers in May to discuss the bid. Mr. Nichol will be interested in how it proceeds, and so will I.

Question put and agreed to.

HEATHROW EXPRESS RAILWAYS BILL [Lords] (By Order)

Orders for Second Reading read.

To be read a Second time on Thursday 26 April.

Oral Answers to Questions

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. By opting to go to Sandringham this afternoon rather than being in his place for Agriculture Question Time in the House of Commons, has not the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food got his priorities wrong? I admire much of the work of Prince Charles, and I have been a staunch supporter in difficult times of the European Community, but does the House agree that it is deeply unhelpful that the heir to the throne and a European Commissioner should consider that their business, however interesting and praiseworthy, should take precedence over a Minister's duty to be in the House of Commons for his own Question Time?

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was going to explain in answer to the first question the reasons for my right hon. Friend's absence. As the House will recall, this Question Time was originally fixed for 5 April and my right hon. Friend, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and two European Commissioners —for agriculture and for environmental affairs—had a long-standing engagement today. My right hon. Friend hopes that the House will understand the importance of his keeping that engagement to deal with extremely important matters.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should get on.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef Industry

1. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the present state of the beef industry.

Mr. Curry: The beef breeding herd is at its highest level for a decade. Last year there was a rise of 9 per cent. over 1988.

Mr. Carlile: Under European Community rules, the Government could pay up to £71·37 per cow in hill livestock compensatory allowance. At the moment they are paying merely £54·50. Why will not the Government support hill farmers to the hilt when their incomes are depressed largely as a result of Government policy?

Mr. Curry: The Government support hill livestock producers very substantially. We recently increased the hill livestock compensatory allowance for sheep producers and we judged that that was the best place to put a limited resource. The hon. and learned Gentleman will recall that last year we increased the suckler cow premium by 42 per cent. and extended it to smaller farmers. That particularly affects beet producers, 60 per cent. of whom are in less-favoured areas. We direct £50 million a year in HLCAs to beef producers in the uplands. So we have nothing to apologise for in our support of the beef industry.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that the increase in the suckler cow subsidy does much to improve confidence in the beef industry? As rearing hill calves is a long-term project, will he give as early warning as possible about the future of the HLCAs for next year so that farmers can plan with confidence?

Mr. Curry: I take heed of my hon. Friend's comments. The fact that we have to negotiate in Brussels means that sometimes we cannot give as much warning as we should like because negotiations are delayed. It is certainly true that we have at heart the welfare of those beef producers.

Dr. David Clark: As the issue dominating the beef industry is mad cow disease, why do the Government refuse to implement the recommendation of their own Tyrrell working party and undertake a random sample of dead cows at slaughterhouses to ascertain the extent of mad cow disease in the British herd?

Mr. Curry: The reason is that the measures that we have taken are more effective. We maintain extremely effective controls, and many of our actions have gone beyond the recommendations of our scientific advisers. We believe that the precautionary approach is right. We have done everything possible to safeguard public health and have gone beyond many of the recommendations made in that respect.

Food Hygiene

2. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the hygiene standards of British food resulting from the Food Safety Bill and those of food from other European Community countries.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): The Food Safety Bill is a joint initiative between my Department and the Department of Health.

Once the Bill and various subsidiary regulations are in place, we will have a comprehensive and flexible framework in controls, equal to the very best in the world.

Mr. Coombs: My hon. Friend and the whole House will be aware that the Food Safety Bill creates a framework for a mass of secondary legislation in the form of regulations on food safety. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that he will consult widely and thoroughly on all the regulations before they and the Bill become law to ensure that British food continues to be as safe and wholesome as any in the world?

Mr. Maclean: As my hon. Friend knows, the Bill allows us to consult on a wide variety of regulations and I can give the House the assurance that he seeks. We will consult widely on the regulations that will be required as the Bill becomes law. We shall conduct those negotiations and consultations during the summer. I thank the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for his kind comments about the Bill in an article in the Financial Times last week.

Dr. David Clark: If food hygiene standards in Britain are as high as the Minister says, why has food poisoning increased fivefold since the Government took office?

Mr. Maclean: It is strange for the hon. Gentleman suddenly to attribute food poisoning to the Government taking office. That is quite bogus and the correlation cannot be made. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is so.

Sugar Beet

3. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future of the United Kingdom sugar beet industry.

Mr. Curry: The United Kingdom sugar beet industry grows and processes about half the United Kingdom's sugar requirements. We will seek to ensure that British sugar interests are defended in the forthcoming review of the Community's support arrangements.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is in the British interest that British Sugar should remain a British-owned company? Does he agree that foreign acquisition of it would be bad for employment and bad for British sugar beet growers?

Mr. Curry: The ownership of British Sugar is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Office of Fair Trading. My function is to ensure that the interests of British beet farmers and British beet production are safeguarded. I shall pay close attention to that in the negotiations.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Minister discussed the representations concerning the future of the British sugar beet industry with the Chairman of the Select Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. Curry: No, Sir.

Sir William Clark: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government intend to continue to import the present tonnages of cane sugar?

Mr. Curry: Yes, I can give that assurance. The importation of 1·3 million tonnes of cane sugar from the developing countries is important to the United Kingdom. It constitutes half our supply and a major outlet for cane producers. Next month, I shall address the ministerial meeting of the African, Caribbean and Pacific producers on precisely that subject.

Salmonella

4. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has met poultry farmers to discuss the problem of salmonella poisoning during the last six months.

Mr. Maclean: Ministers and officials at my Department have, on a number of occasions, met and corresponded with individual poultry farmers and organisations on matters relating to salmonella.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Minister fully aware of the serious anxiety and vulnerability of most egg producers? Is not their critical position compounded by the importation of foreign eggs, which may be dumped? Although they are subject to testing, is he aware that the rest of the batch of eggs not taken for testing will have been eaten long before the results of the test are known? Is not that ridiculous?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that, as has been stated many times in the House, we do not have the power to ban the importation of foreign eggs. Nevertheless, we have followed—and are keen to follow—the Select Committee's advice that we should redouble our efforts in the EC to achieve EC-wide salmonella controls. I am pleased to tell the House that those negotiations are proceeding apace. We expect to hear proposals from the Commission in May with a view to their being completed this year. That is the best safeguard that we can give to our producers and consumers.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Notwithstanding my hon. Friend's excellent efforts to achieve EC-wide safeguards against salmonella, will he bear in mind the fact that other European countries have a far lower standard of overall hygiene than we have? Will he ensure that nothing in the harmonisation process weakens the effects of the Food Safety Bill or the ability of the Government to safeguard our people against food poisoning?

Mr. Maclean: The criticism at present is that we are making too strenuous efforts to control aspects of food poisoning. We do not intend to weaken our efforts to protect our consumers, irrespective of what products they are eating. We shall be stressing in Europe the need for Europewide controls to be placed as effectively in other EC countries as they are placed here.

Mr. Lofthouse: What is the point of testing the eggs if the vast majority have already been eaten?

Mr. Maclean: Because we can take up the matter immediately with the Government of the egg-producing country concerned—as we did when we found salmonella in eight consignments of eggs—and that Government can take the necessary action. That is the extent of what we can do under existing salmonella controls and that is why we want better ones. I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that in the first two months of this year egg imports represented only 4 per cent. of eggs consumed. That is a small proportion of our egg supply.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the Minister reassure me that rare breeds of hens will be safeguarded? They may require a special regulation. Their gene banks are very important.

Mr. Maclean: I am delighted to give my hon. Friend that reassurance. There is no question of a special rare breed of bird being exterminated. However, I also give the House the assurance that anyone who sells eggs to the public for profit, whether those eggs come from rare brids or others, cannot expect to be exempt from the salmonella controls or from our public health measures.

Fishing Industry

5. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received from representatives of the west coast of Scotland fishing industry.

Mr. Curry: In response to concerns expressed by west coast fishermen, we have issued a consultation document on fisheries management on the west coast.

Mr. Macdonald: May I ask the Minister specifically about the proposal to allow the aggregation of licences? Will he take on board the concern expressed by west coast fishermen that that will simply mean that larger operations, usually on the east coast of Scotland, will buy up the smaller boats of the west coast? That will mean a loss of livelihood for west coast fishermen and will harm conservation in the long run.

Mr. Curry: I wish to get the terminology straight. The proposals that we have just announced are for the aggregation of capacity, not licences. Even if we then proceed to adopt a consultation document on the aggregation of entitlements, it will not concern licences as such. We are a long way from a transferable licence, although, as I have always made clear, it is an option. The aggregation of capacity is a limited measure which aims to get fishermen away from the tight straitjacket of being unable to increase tonnage or horsepower at all. Fishermen can now buy a bigger boat and obtain the catching capacity entitlement that goes with a boat of that size. Fishing entitlement aggregation would be a more radical measure and would push more in the direction of the rationalisation of the fleet. However, we are committed to consulting widely before introducing such a measure.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Minister understand that thousands of fish processing workers in the west of, and throughout, Scotland face a wage freeze in the current year? Does he appreciate that they are among the lowest-paid industrial workers in the country, in most cases earning £100 or less for a full week's work, at a time when inflation is pushing towards double digits? How long will it be before the Minister and his colleagues snap out of their complacency and introduce a crisis package of measures to stabilise the fortunes of the industry, onshore and offshore?

Mr. Curry: What the hon. Gentleman means by crisis package of measures to stabilise the industry is that we should simply give it more money; that is his familiar theme. The action that we plan to take is, first, to make management more effective, with the series of measures that I outlined to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) and, secondly, to tackle seriously the question of conservation. I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that workers in the west coast processing industry would be much worse off if we did not manage our fisheries to ensure that there was fish to catch in the future.

Grain

6. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has received any representations about the competitive position of bakers using north American grain in preference to European grain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I have received no representations, but I am arguing for a reduction of the high levy imposed on north American wheat in the current price negotiations. The bread-making quality of home-produced wheat has improved to such an extent that we now use less than a tenth of the amount of imported grain that we were using 10 years ago.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. Friend do his utmost to achieve a reduction in agriculture tariffs at the forthcoming GATT talks so that quality bakers, such as Warburtons in my constituency, no longer have to pay a levy of £100 a tonne on imported north American high protein grains?

Mr. Curry: We shall press to get levies down and the GATT talks will almost certainly result in a phased programme of cuts sustained over a number of years. Without that, I do not think that the GATT talks would succeed at all. I remind my hon. Friend that the stabiliser has produced three years of cuts in grain prices and that farmers are feeling the pinch. It is only fair to say that if we obtain the green pound devaluation for which we are aiming—in the United Kingdom, at least—grain prices will rise, which will put farmers on more equal terms with their competitors overseas.

Mr. Strang: Does the Minister accept that the major problem affecting competition with European grain producers is the enormous burden and disadvantage imposed on the home industry as a consequence of the gap between the green pound and sterling? Does he accept that the original proposal to cut the gap by one third is inadequate in relation to those commodities for which the difference is well over 10 per cent.?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman will see from the arrangements that were on the table when the price-fixing negotiations broke up a few weeks ago that the devaluation of one third had rather passed into history. We very much hope that when the negotiations resume, it will stay part of history.

Mr. Andy Stewart: As British millers and bakers are buying wheat at 30 per cent. less in real terms than they were five years ago, does my hon. Friend agree that it is about time they passed on some of their good fortune to their customers?

Mr. Curry: It is certainly true that the price of grain as a raw material for the bread maker has not increased recently. It is also true that we must strike a balance—that is what most politics is about—between the interests of the producer and the interests of the consumer. At the moment, it is the producers who believe that they face an injustice, and we are trying to correct that.

Eastern Europe

7. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of his discussions following his recent visits to Poland, Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria.

Mr. Curry: The principal purpose of my right hon. Friend's visits to Poland, Czeckoslovakia and Bulgaria was to support political and economic reform in those countries and to seek export opportunities for British business men.

Mr. Field: As he is one of the foremost defenders of British fishing interests, will my hon. Friend allow me to congratulate him on organising a three-month course on fisheries management at Hull for Polish fisheries managers, at a cost to the British taxpayer of £133,000? Does my hon. Friend agree that, in view of the size of the eastern bloc fishing fleet and as trawlers no longer have to eavesdrop on boring ministerial conversations and can concentrate instead on fishing, it is important that Britain leads the way in showing the eastern bloc fleet how to conserve its stocks rather than continue to plunder them recklessly?

Mr. Curry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The project that he mentioned is an example of the carefully targeted aid that we envisage for eastern Europe. On eastern European fisheries capacity, EC resources are shared out according to track record and there is no case for allowing east European vessels to fish Community waters. I have made it clear at a number of Fisheries Councils that we will not allow Soviet, Polish or other vessels into the North sea.

The West German fleet underfishes by about one third of its capacity and there is room for East Germany to take some of that quota without seeking any general allocation at European level. Of course, some eastern European waters might be available for western fisheries if East Germany joins the European Community.

However, I completely agree with my hon. Friend; we are not in the business of giving away a scarce resource, particularly to those who might not be most attentive to its conservation.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: Will the Minister give assurances that measures to help east European farmers will cause minimum disruption to the home industry, for example with regard to the bulk import of cheap fruit pulp? If the object of the exercise is to increase finance for east European farmers, would not it be more sensible to do that by fixing cross-border prices rather than by using the tariff system, which can cause great disruption to the home industry?

Mr. Curry: When proposals were made to give concessions under the generalised system of preferences to Poland and Hungary, the United Kingdom argued that they should be restricted. We have since had close discussions about careful monitoring of the price arrangements. We can sustain imports provided that the prices are genuine and not dumping prices. We are in touch with the Commission and we will ensure that aid is specific and limited, that it will not damage our industry and that we do not make a greater contribution than anyone else to the necessary process of liberalisation in eastern Europe.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: During my right hon. Friend the Minister's extremely successful visit to eastern Europe, did he detect any enthusisam to revert to the old-fashioned and failed economic policies of socialism and communism, or did he find an enthusiasm to embrace many of the economic policies that our Government were the first to introduce in this country over the past 10 years?

Mr. Curry: I understand that when Belisarius reconquered Italy, he coined the phrase, "If you seek a desert, look around you". I think that my right hon. Friend the Minister looked around eastern Europe and saw that 40 years of socialism had had the same effect. He gained no impression of an anxiety to revert to communism, but of a considerable anxiety to learn some of the elements of capitalism.

Farm Animal Welfare Council

8. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reports he is expecting from the Farm Animal Welfare Council.

Mr. Maclean: The Farm Animal Welfare Council has just started studies of the welfare of broiler chickens and of animals kept in extensive husbandry systems. I look forward to receiving the council's advice when this work has been completed.

Dr. Howells: The Minister will be aware that the main recommendation of the February 1990 report from the council was that recommendations in earlier reports, which are still outstanding, should be implemented. He has not implemented those recommendations. Will he ignore the February 1990 report like he ignored all the others? Will he continue to allow animals to be subjected to misery?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are unfair and wrong. We received two reports in February which we are currently consulting on and studying. We have accepted the overwhelming majority of FAWC recommendations and many of them have already been put into legislative effect. I hope to lay before the House shortly detailed regulations on the slaughter of red meat animals and later this year regulations on the welfare of horses at markets. The hon. Gentleman must be careful before he makes erroneous comments to the effect that we have ignored FAWC reports.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that the acceptance of many FAWC recommendations has helped to ensure that this country has one of the best records on farm animal welfare in the European Community? In future changes in the welfare codes, will my hon. Friend try to ensure that those practices are extended, not just in this country, but throughout the European Community so that we do not export unacceptable husbandry practices?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head. When we consider welfare in this country and the excellent FAWC reports, we accept that it is becoming increasingly important to extend those provisions to other EC countries. That is why my right hon. Friend the Minister took a welfare initiative in the EC. We sent EC Commissioners a host of recommendations on animal welfare that we would like to be extended across the Community. If we like animals and believe in their welfare, it is not good enough simply to improve their lot in Britain and these islands; the morality must extend overseas, too.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister confirm that FAWC has the right to inspect and to report on puppy farms which, in certain instances, have been the cause of considerable abuse? What is the Government's latest thinking on that matter and what do they intend to do to tighten controls in that area?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is right to be concerned about welfare on puppy farms. This is a matter for the Home Office, and I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department is currently considering what action can be taken. I shall certainly pass on to him the hon. Gentleman's concerns.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Further to the previous question, will my hon. Friend take this issue seriously? There have been strong reports about puppy farming in west Wales and we have seen horrific photographs of emaciated dogs being cruelly treated. The matter causes great concern to my constituents and we need Government action immediately.

Mr. Maclean: Those of us who like animals, and especially those of us who love dogs, agree with my hon. Friend that action is required. That is why my hon. Friend at the Home Office is considering what action can be taken. Having heard the views expressed in the House today, I shall be pleased to confirm to my hon. Friend that the House wants action on this matter.

Mr. Ron Davies: May I remind the Minister that the February report on enforcement specifically recommended that the number of vets in the state veterinary service should be increased to allow them to discharge properly their responsibilities on animal welfare? Given that during the past 10 years the Government have reduced the number of vets in the state veterinary service by 25 per cent., yet, despite that, the Government still apparently have a commitment to animal welfare, will the Minister now undertake to accept that specific and direct recommendation in the FAWC enforcement report and ensure that the number of vets in the state veterinary service is increased?

Mr. Maclean: I have made it clear that, having just received those reports, we are currently considering all the recommendations and are consulting widely on them. The hon. Gentleman should not be obsessed merely with the numbers employed in the state veterinary service. He should be more concerned about how effectively and efficiently it is carrying out its work. I am delighted to be able to tell him that its efficiency and effectiveness has improved considerably. I am proud of the excellent job that it does in all aspects of animal welfare and in enforcing the regulations.

Sheep Farmers

9. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to ensure that the cash flow of sheep farmers is improved in the next 12 months.

Mr. Curry: Our plans to pay two advances of sheep annual premium to producers in both less-favoured areas and other parts of the United Kingdom will help the cash flow of sheep farmers.

Mr. Nicholson: That reply was welcome, as was my hon. Friend's recent visit to my constituency, where he gave an excellent speech to a conference organised by the Exmoor Society and when he made the valid point that no honest Government could guarantee the income of every farmer, irrespective of the circumstances. Will he confirm that his Department gives the highest priority to providing incentives to farmers to remain on the uplands, because farmers are our best conservationists?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct and I am grateful for his kind remarks, despite the fact that it was raining heavily in his constituency at that time. The Government put considerable resources into the uplands, but we cannot guarantee the livelihoods of all farmers there. However, it is clear that society is putting a higher and higher price on conservation of the countryside, and it is in our interests to encourage farmers to take advantage of that and to add to their fundamental role as food producers, the role of being the guardians of the countryside, as we all appreciate.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Minister agree that the incomes of many sheep farmers are still being reduced because of the loss of stock and the worrying of stock by dogs? What is the Government's most recent estimate of the number of animals that are worried to death by dogs and how much does that cost farmers? Is not it high time that we had a proper dog registration scheme to encourage responsible dog owners and to stop some of the waste of animals' lives as a result of sheep worrying?

Mr. Curry: Most sheep farmers in my constituency have a clear formula for dealing with dogs that worry sheep.

Mr. Marland: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Buckinghamshire there has been an outbreak of caseous lymphadenitis and that the disease affects sheep? Will he take this opportunity to reassure the House and all sheep farmers that his Ministry is taking all necessary precautions to make sure that the disease does not spread elsewhere?

Mr. Curry: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. The disease has been found in goats, but it has not yet spread to sheep. We have taken strict precautions to ensure that there is no risk to human health.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is the Minister aware that the announcement that he made earlier about the advance payments is welcome as far as it goes? However, does he accept that a serious cash flow problem faces sheep producers in the uplands, particularly in areas such as the Scottish borders? Does he further accept that one of the best ways to solve cash flow problems faced by sheep producers is to take advantage of the flexibility that he still has within the hill livestock compensatory allowance mechanism, which at present affords a payment of only £7·50 per ewe, whereas the European Economic Community would allow a payment of £10·70 per breeding animal? Will the Government use that flexibility to eliminate some of the cash flow problems facing sheep producers?

Mr. Curry: I am afraid that there is a Catch-22 in what the hon. Gentleman says. If we were to pay the full amount, the number of animals that would be eligible for the full payment under the headage limit would be reduced. We used the resources at our disposal to increase the HLCAs. We also argued for maximum flexibility in the European regulations. The hon. Gentleman must understand that our resources are limited. We shall always put them where they are most effective.

National Farmers Union

10. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the president of the National Farmers Union; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend last met the president of the National Farmers Union on 4 April, to discuss how the United Kingdom agriculture and food industry could best respond to recent developments in eastern Europe.

Mr. Yeo: When my hon. Friend next meets the NFU, will he assure it of the Government's continuing and strenuous efforts to achieve a substantial devaluation in the green pound? Does he agree that when farmers in south Suffolk and elsewhere call for such a devaluation, they are merely asking for a chance to compete on equal and level ground with their continental counterparts?

Mr. Curry: I agree with my hon. Friend that we are seeking not to give British farmers an advantage but simply to curb some of the disadvantages that they suffer because of the problem with the green pound. At the same time, farmers should be realistic. Demands that we should devalue the green pound in one go are unrealistic. We shall do the best that we can, taking into account all the facts that must be considered.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Did the Minister discuss with the president his predecessor's abolition last year of the guaranteed price for wool, which will have a disastrous effect on the economy of the hill farming areas? At this late stage, will he have another consultation with the chairman of the Wool Marketing Board to discuss the continuation of the scheme, which has operated so successfully in this country for the past 30 years?

Mr. Curry: Of course, we have discussed the issue extensively with wool producers and, indeed, with the board. The measures that we propose command broad consensus. We are discussing what the guarantee should be for the current year and hope to decide it shortly. When we eventually introduce the legislation to abolish the guarantee, we expect that it will have broad support in the House.

Mr. Hague: When my hon. Friend next meets the president of the NFU, will he be able to tell him when European Community Ministers will get round to agreeing not only a devaluation of the green pound, but the final instalment of this year's ewe premium, which is eagerly awaited in this country?

Mr. Curry: I hope that I shall be able to do that. The premium is fixed by the management committee. At a meeting yesterday it was taken off the agenda by the Commission, as it was the previous month. We are pressing that the decision should be taken quickly so that we can pay the final instalment. I undertake to make sure that once agreement is reached we shall make the final payment within a month to the best of our abilities.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister say something about the impact of penal interest rates on the rural economy when he next meets the president of the NFU? Now that interest rate payments from the farming industry have reached a crippling £1,000 million a year and its level of indebtedness has increased threefold to £10,000 million since the Government came to power, does he think that the Conservative party will get any more credit from rural voters?

Mr. Curry: I am disappointed to see that the hon. Gentleman has not used his recess to think of some new questions. I discuss a large number of matters with the president of the NFU, but few of his comments or the matters that I discuss with my farmers lead me to suspect that they are about to vote Labour. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House may remember that just before the recess complaints were made about private conversations during Question Time. I hope that that will not happen now.

Horses

11. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on measures available to protect horses and other equines from abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: There are numerous measures that protect equines on common land, on farm, during transit and at export. We hope to introduce specific controls on horse markets in the next few months, and will press in the Community to retain controls on export of horses for slaughter.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware that the horse is man's oldest and most faithful friend and that our history and prosperity have been borne on his back, but that horses will suffer severe and cruel deaths in the knackers' yards of Europe after 1992, unless suitable action is taken to replace British legislation on minimum values? Will he ensure that the Government will somehow get into place right across Europe proper legislation to safeguard horses, especially British horses, from cruel deaths?

Mr. Maclean: I should think that only my two dogs would disagree with the first part of my hon. Friend's assertion about man's best friend. I can give him the absolute assurance that we are determined to fight as strongly as we can for the unique British system of minimum values for horses, because we are all aware of the strength of feeling that horses should be protected better than the present EC proposal suggests.

Mr. Cryer: What are the Government doing to improve the EEC standards? Does the Minister accept that many people are worried about live animals exported for slaughter, because standards of care for animals throughout the Common Market vary and are often lower than United Kingdom standards? Is not it about time that the Government stood up to the EEC Commission and told it to get on with the job of improving standards, instead of capitulating on every occasion?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends must decide which tack to take. Previously they have accused us of resisting too many EC proposals that we think are disadvantageous to the interests of this country. Now the hon. Gentleman's line is that we are capitulating. We shall not capitulate on animal welfare. We shall fight strenuously for our animals and their welfare at slaughter. That is why my right hon. Friend the Minister recently took an initiative in the EC to extend the excellent British system throughout the EC. We shall argue for that.

Mr. Lord: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is nationwide anxiety that when our horses and ponies finish their useful lives they should not be allowed to be exported live for slaughter, with all the misery that that may entail? Does he think it intolerable that our European partners should force us to reduce our standards in any way? Will he please do his best to ensure that that does not happen?

Mr. Maclean: I am delighted to give my hon. Friend that assurance. I urge him and our hon. Friends to lobby in the European Parliament and the European Commission, to show the extent of feeling in Britain for our unique system of minimum values. My hon. Friends and I are doing our bit, arguing to maintain the system, but we need the support of welfare organisations in this country and Europe to convince everyone that minimum values are good and should stay.

Parrots

12. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he has taken as a result of the hon. Member for Linlithgow's meeting with the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson), on the import of parrots.

Mr. Maclean: New measures on the import of exotic birds were announced last December following our publication of a detailed study of mortalities among imported birds on arrival and in quarantine.

Mr. Dalyell: Is not man's best friend the parrot? In view of the fact that the 13 per cent. bird mortality in quarantine and on arrival is a fraction of the overall mortality, can we have an immediate ban imports pending the negotiations now taking place? Does the Prime Minister think that present Ministers are as active or energetic as the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson)?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is right to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson), who met him in his office and took the initial initiative. If hon. Members read the speech before Christmas of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and my reply to it at 4 o'clock in the morning, I should have thought that they would conclude that I was the hon. Gentleman's best friend. We are taking strenuous measures to control the importation of exotic birds and all the measures that I outlined in the debate in December are being pursued at this very moment.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Lewis: Will the right hon. Lady explain why she thinks that it is fair that Mr. and Mrs. Thatcher of Dulwich will save £1,700 in poll tax as against rates this year when Mr. and Mrs. Donovan of Greater Manchester —Mr. Donovan is a retired laboratory technician and they are pensioners—will pay £531 more than they would have done, including transitional relief?

The Prime Minister: I think that we should all be better off if we lived in good Tory authorities such as Westminster. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall not be any net better off when I finish giving the extra away, nor shall I be any better off than I am now by not having taken something like £120,000 to which I am entitled on my salary.

Q2. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Sumberg: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning those who deliberately break the law by refusing to pay their community charge, leaving others to pick up the bill? Is not it deplorable that there are Members of the House who also practise that unlawful conduct? Surely such people are encouraged by the pop star antics and clenched fist salutes of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Prime Minister: Everyone should obey the laws that have properly been passed through Parliament, as that is what the rule of law and democracy is about. Anyone who does not is setting a deplorable example, is also putting great burdens on others and is not in any way being democratic or observing the rule of law. Everyone should condemn such behaviour.

Mr. Flannery: Will the Prime Minister explain why the party of defence and law and order, which never believes that a single Labour soldier fought in the last war, now cannot even recognise a gun barrel?

The Prime Minister: I should like to say first to the hon. Gentleman that everyone is grateful to all those who fought in the last war; without them we should not now be free. So far there has never been a gun barrel made with an aperture of 1m wide, which is the diameter of the proposed Iraqi pipe.

Q3. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Does my right hon. Friend share my view that Ford's investment of £400 million in south Wales is a sign of investors' confidence in Britain under her Government? Does she further agree that the fact that Ford is spending some of its investment abroad because of previous trade union intransigence is a clear sign that investors are worried about the future and of what investors would do if this country were ever again to be dominated by the Labour party's trade union paymasters?

The Prime Minister: We do indeed welcome Ford's investment at Bridgend and Swansea, phase 1 of the Zeta project, which will help to sustain employment in south Wales. We very much regret that Ford chose to take the second part of that project to Cologne because, in the words of its press release,

> "Another factor in reaching the decision . . . has been the need to ensure continuity of supply to our continental plants."

As Ford could not ensure continuity of supply from south Wales because of the activities of the unions, it was not prepared to put another factory there. The unions have driven Ford away twice—once from Dundee and once from the Zeta 2 project in south Wales.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister say why there has been no effective response from any part of the Government to the inquiries made since 1988 about the Iraqi gun contract by Sheffield Forgemasters, Walter Somers and her hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller)?

The Prime Minister: The point remains that at no time did either firm apply for an export licence for a gun or other military application. If the firms had done so, the application would have been refused.

Mr. Kinnock: That is not an adequate answer on such an issue. As Head of the Government, will the Prime Minister say whom she holds responsible for this shambles over the Iraqi gun contract? Which Minister must bear the blame?

The Prime Minister: Any company wanting to export something that requires an export licence has a duty to apply for that licence. At no time did either firm apply for an export licence for a gun or other military application. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said yesterday, the enormous 1m wide pipes that the firms were making were described in a totally different fashion and at no time did they apply for an export licence for a gun or other military equipment. Had they done so, the application would have been refused. It is their duty to apply if they are exporting something that needs a licence.

Mr. Kinnock: That is the most devious evasion. The testimony of the right hon. Lady's hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove has shattered the idea that the Government did not know about this during the past two years. I repeat: which Minister is to blame?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman ever listens to replies. If a company wishes to export something that needs an export licence—military equipment does—it is its duty accurately to describe it and to apply for an export licence for what it is exporting. No such application came for a gun or other military application. That is the fault of the companies seeking to export the product.

Mr. Hunter: In forming her policies towards South Africa and the African National Congress, will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that less than two years ago the ANC publicly announced that it would accept funds from the IRA? Will she personally look into reports coming from Northern Ireland that on Wednesday 4 April two members of the ANC named Sabblae and Karoo were in Downpatrick, County Down, meeting the head of the IRA in South Down and other members?

The Prime Minister: I am certain that my hon. Friend will have checked the facts that he gives. He knows that we never, never support armed struggle, no matter by whomsoever it is proposed, and the ANC stands for armed struggle and continues to do so. In our view it is time to get down, not to rhetoric but to the nitty gritty of negotiations, and to do that in South Africa with the existing South African Government.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the Prime Minister list for the House her reasons for opposing local income tax, raised through the revenue system, as a replacement for poll tax? Does not she realise that it would be easier, fairer, simpler and cheaper to raise than the poll tax, and just as accountable, and that it operates in many countries with full public support? Does not she see that local income tax as a replacement for poll tax is a way out of her and Britain's poll tax nightmare?

The Prime Minister: There are several reasons why local income tax would not work. First, it is usually dealt with not where a person lives, but where he works, which, for many people, is a different place. PAYE is done in the firm for which a person works, which may be different from the place in which he lives.

Secondly, many people would not wish to divulge all their affairs again to local authorities, and they would have to do so. Those are two good reasons for not having a local income tax.

EC Budget

Q4. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the size of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Community budget; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so. The Fontainebleau 1984 mechanism remains wholly intact. Our cumulative benefit from it will be some £7·5 billion by the end of 1990.

Mr. Taylor: As last year's record contribution of £2 billion, or £3 a week for each British family, was outrageous, will my right hon. Friend make it abundantly clear that had she not battled so furiously for rebates in 1984, that amount would have been at least 50 per cent. higher—and this at a time when she was accused of being negative, unhelpful and unenthusiastic about Europe?

As almost everyone seems to be having a go at her these days, will my right hon. Friend also make it abundantly clear that she will maintain her courageous battle for Britain against socialist nonsense and overspending in the EEC? Will she totally ignore the views of the wimps and Euro-nuts among the Opposition—and even among the Conservative party—who are seeking to blow her off course?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. We fought staunchly for Britain's rebate. We started off, to coin a phrase, by being isolated and we came back with £7·5 billion for Britain.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Prime Minister confirm that in addition to financial matters, she and the Foreign Secretary will discuss the Belgian proposals for European union with other Ministers from the Common Market when they meet in Dublin over the next two weekends? Does she agree that these issues render the prerogative an increasingly outdated idea, and accordingly, will she tell Mr. Haughey when she meets him tomorrow that she is not prepared to give any view on, still less any commitment to, that paper unless it has been debated in this House? Does not she think that anything less than that represents an unacceptable democratic deficit in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: There are now two matters: one is European monetary and economic union; another has been proposed informally by Chancellor Kohl and concerns political union. Neither matter is properly defined, but in so far as economic and monetary union was defined in the Delors paper, in stages 2 and 3, this House has already made its view clear: we could not possibly accept stage 2 or stage 3 of Delors as they stand, although we accept stage 1. [HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] We accept stage 1 and its completion and we are well ahead with completing it in this country.

In our view there are plenty of other matters to discuss in Dublin—the consequences of German unification, completing the single market in 1992, bringing the Uruguay round to a successful conclusion, especially on agriculture, completing the EEC-European Free Trade Association negotiations, and devising new forms of association for the countries of eastern Europe. If we got down to discussing those matters, that would be far better than discussing more esoteric issues that do not need to be addressed now.

Engagements

Q5. Sir John Stokes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 19 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir John Stokes: Is my right hon. Friend aware that today is Primrose day, the anniversary of the death of Benjamin Disraeli, that great Conservative statesman? Does she recollect that he used to say that one of the principal aims of the Tory party was to improve the condition of the people? Is not that precisely what my right hon. Friend and the Government are doing?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In terms of net take-home pay, for every £3 that the average family had under Labour, it has £4 under the Conservatives. Britain has a higher rate of employment and a far better Health Service and environment than ever before. That would have suited Disraeli and I am glad to pay tribute to him on Primrose day.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Will the Leader of the House tell us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Sir Geoffrey Howe): The business for next week will be as follows:

Monday 23 April and Tuesday 24 April—Consideration in Committee of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill [Lords] (1st and 2nd Allotted Days).

Wednesday 25 April—Opposition day (11th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The poll tax, the uniform business rate and local government services".

Remaining stages of the War Crimes Bill.

Thursday 26 April—Remaining stages of the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Bill.

Motion to take note of EC document relating to the automobile industry. Details will be given in the Official Report.

Friday 27 April—Private Members' Bills.

Monday 30 April—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

[Thursday 26 April: Relevant European Community Document: 10971/89 Single Motor Vehicle Market
Relevant Report of European Legislation Committee: HC 11-xii (1989-90) para 2.]

Dr. Cunningham: Will the Leader of the House reconsider his proposal that the House should take the remaining stages of the War Crimes Bill after 10 pm? It is not usual for us to consider primary legislation after 10 pm in the House. We regard that as an unacceptable proposal, and I hope that he will take it away and think again about it.

Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman give the House some more explanation about the likely course of events when we come to consider the amendments to the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill on Tuesday night? Is he aware that it appears that the House will be asked to vote on perhaps 14 consecutive amendments, taking four or more hours of voting time during the night? Is it reasonable or rational to ask the House of Commons to determine such important, controversial and sensitive issues in that way? I hope that we can have some explanation from the Leader of the House of why the House is being placed in that position.

Is not Parliament entitled to some clarification from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry following his statement yesterday about the Iraqi gun fiasco? Should not we have some urgent and candid answers from the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence to the many unanswered questions which remain following the exchanges in the House yesterday?

For example, who will explain the widely differing versions of events given by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir. H. Miller)? I hope that the Leader of the House will soon provide Government time for a debate so that we can have proper answers to those questions to make up for the pathetically inadequate performance given by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in the Chamber yesterday.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Of course I understand why the Gentleman raises his first point. However, it is important for the House to get ahead with the business at convenient opportunities. The House had a full day's debate on the general principles of the War Crimes Bill on Second Reading on 19 March. No amendments have been made to the Bill in Committee, and no Government amendments are proposed on Report. In those circumstances, what I have proposed should be reasonable.

I understand why the hon. Gentleman raised his point about the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill, but he will know that there has been extensive consultation about the handling of the Bill, both through the usual channels and with a wide range of other representatives. I do not expect to have commanded universal assent to that, but I believe that I have arrived at conclusions that are the best practicable arrangements.

It is important for us to tackle the central questions in an orderly fashion, and together. Again, we have considered through the usual channels and in other ways the possibility of separating them, but that has given rise to anxiety that hon. Members might vote on one part of the debate and not remain closely involved to vote on the other part. We have arrived at the conclusion that this is the best way to do it. I appreciate that considerable time may be spent on voting, but if we address the matter sensibly we should be able to reduce the number of contested votes. I believe that it will be regarded in the end as more satisfactory to do that than to spend a great deal of time debating without reaching a conclusion, as has happened so often in the past.

As for the questions about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, he made a statement to the House yesterday describing all that was then known about the matter. The components in question were apprehended as a result of alertness once the matter became known. It is in the nature of things that exports of that type take place against a background of subterfuge and concealment, not least on the part of the orderers, and those concerned with supply are not always fully informed of what is happening or how they should be handling the matter. The Government have apprehended the components, and further investigations must take place. If it is thought right to tell the House any more about the matter at any future stage, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will consider doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I point out that no fewer than 49 hon. and right hon. Members are seeking to take part in the subsequent Hong Kong debate? I hope that hon. Members will put only one question each to the Leader of the House, and confine it to next week's business.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many hon. Members on both sides of the House welcome his decision on dealing with the abortion question next Tuesday night? At last there will be a decision without obstruction. It is worth voting, if necessary for four hours, to clear the matter up.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend; that is the other side of the argument.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that there is a prayer concerning the Criminal Damage (Compensation)

(Northern Ireland) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1990. Will he find time for a full debate on the matter? The regulations have been with us for a long while, and it is about time that the House explored the matter once more to come to conclusions on certain inequities that are beginning to show up.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot say more than that I will examine the matter closely in the light of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): In next Wednesday's debate initiated by the Opposition on the community charge and the uniform business rate, will my right hon. and learned Friend arrange for the the Secretary of State for the Environment to remind the House that, of the totality of local government expenditure, a sizeable amount is met through national taxation, and that therefore ability to pay—a matter widely referred to in the press and in the House recently—is already a matter carefully taken into account by Her Majesty's Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall certainly draw that important point to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Did the Leader of the House watch the programme on television last night in the "Inside Story" series called, "Our Reactor is on Fire"? If he or those in his Department did not see it, I offer him a copy of the programme and ask him to look at it and take note of how the Prime Minister and the Cabinet of the day were duped by the nuclear industry and how the Black inquiry, which was set up specifically to look into health problems of that community on the Cumbrian coast, was deliberately kept in ignorance. If he cannot initiate a debate next week in Government time, will the Leader of the House allow the House an early opportunity to discuss the degree of mendacity that the nuclear industry visited on what appears to have been a supine Government in the past?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not accept the judgment that the hon. Gentleman makes on the entire industry, nor, I suspect, does the shadow Leader of the House. The safety of the industry, and of Sellafield in particular, has been subject to continuous scrutiny by the Health and Safety Executive authorities and the Government.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): While I accept that next Wednesday's debate on local government finance and the community charge arises on an Opposition motion, will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that during that debate, the powers that be in the Government produce proposals to remove the inadequacy of the current rebate scheme and the transitional relief scheme and to raise the £3,000 limit at which the taper begins to make what is in principle a good change in local government finance acceptable to the people?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I hope that my hon. Friend will take the opportunity offered by the debate to make those points. He might also take the opportunity to comment on the fact that the Opposition are now apparently dedicated to maintaining the community charge for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman reconsider his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) about the Iraqi gun incident and the answers that were given yesterday by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has developed a new doctrine that Ministers can refuse to answer a question because there may be a case pending in the courts? You, Mr. Speaker, were right to say that it was not a matter for you, but it is a matter for Members of Parliament, as that would mean that, in future any Minister in any Government could refuse to answer a question because there might be a court case pending. Therefore, it is a matter for the House of Commons, and we should be debating it. I ask the Leader of the House to reconsider his answer and to provide a early debate on that aspect of the matter as well as the particular incident.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not think that the matter spreads as widely as the hon. Gentleman suggests. One can well imagine that in other circumstances, a Minister would be unable to comment on every aspect of a matter that is still the subject of inquiry for a variety of reasons including the possibility of criminal proceedings. In those circumstances, there must be some inhibition, but, as I have said already, if a suitable means arises, I am quite sure that my right hon. Friend will be prepared to come back to the House.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, at Question Time yesterday, the Minister for Industry made a significant statement about the huge increase in Britain's car manufacturing capacity? In the circumstances, despite what is happening at Ford, does he agree that we should have a debate on the industry soon, as one of the great success stories of recent years?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend. The continuing expansion of our automobile manufacturing capability is an important achievement of the past 10 years.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Happily, the Government have now accepted the intention of my Bill, supported by right hon. and hon. Members of all parties in the House, to give the people of Australia one of the two original copies of their Constitution Act. While I am grateful to the Lord Chancellor and the Leader of the House for their most helpful discussions with me on the legislation, is there anything that the right hon. and learned Gentleman can tell us today about the timing of its passage through the House? Could we possibly mark ANZAC day on 25 April by completing in this House at least one stage of the Bill?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have seen that suggestion made, although on a rather more ambitious basis. I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the timing proposals for that Bill; nor would I want to raise any expectations of the kind that he has identified. I shall certainly see whether it is possible.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): When my right hon. and learned Friend is discussing next Wednesday's debate with the Secretary of State for the Environment, will he ask him to deal at length with transferring the whole cost of education, or at least teachers' salaries, from local authorities to the central Exchequer? Will he also deal with the plight of village shops, which is a very real one?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I will draw both points to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, but I cannot resist the opportunity to say yet again to my hon. Friend what I said during the Easter Adjournment debate: merely transferring the financing of this or that aspect of any activity to central Government amounts to no more than a book-keeping transaction.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the Leader of the House arrange a further debate following the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer)? The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that, yesterday, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that his Department was not aware of the gun contract with Iraq. He will be further aware that the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller), a former deputy chairman of the Conservative party, did not agree with him. He said that he had informed the Department twice about the gun but that he had had to go elsewhere to get some action.

Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman think that this matter needs clearing up for the benefit of the House and of the country, to decide who is telling the truth and who is lying?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There are clearly matters that can be further examined, but I do not honestly think that it is sensible for us to do so across the Floor of the House.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): May I reinforce the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton)? Almost everyone agrees that the principle of the community charge is right, that everyone should pay something, but most people will agree that at the least, the first year's implementation has been unfortunate. Will my right hon. and learned Friend insist on the Secretary of State for the Environment—the Government realise the need for this—announcing proposals in his speech next week for reform and change, because it is time that they were debated?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am more ready to endorse my hon. Friend's warm welcome for the principle of the community charge than the rest of his remarks, but I shall bring his observations to the attention of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): As the Leader of the House has found himself unable to arrange debates on some of the many outstanding statutory instruments that are the subject of prayers on the Order Paper, will he give the House an undertaking that important issues such as the Police (Scotland) (Amendment) Regulations—police officers have been considerably financially prejudiced as a result of the poll tax regulations—and the National Health Service (Charges for Drugs and Appliances) (Amendment) Regulations will be debated in Committee next week?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot give a specific undertaking in respect of either of those matters—certainly not for next week. I understand that there is widespread interest in the police regulations and I shall seek through the usual channels to find an opportunity for them to be discussed in due course.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): May we have a debate on Lithuania? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware of the widespread concern about the reaction of the Soviet authorities? Is he further aware of the feeling that the EEC and the Government must come up with some initiatives for aid? May we have a debate in the near future?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The whole House will understand my hon. Friend's expression of concern. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will discuss the matter with his colleagues in the Twelve during their meeting this weekend.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Following the extremely important question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), and as this matter affects the rights of the House against the Executive, will the Leader of the House, first, say when the Solicitor-General or the Attorney-General will make a statement on the legal aspects of the matter? Secondly, will he give an absolute guarantee that the Minister concerned will appear before the House if there is to be no legal case, because he took refuge in the fact that there would be one? We think that it was quite improper that he should have done so, but if he is to proceed, he must explain himself to the House.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am not sure whether the Law Officers would be the most appropriate Ministers to respond on a matter that is the subject of possible proceedings by the Customs and Excise rather than by the Law Officers' Department. The matter is still under investigation in that way. The right hon. Gentleman should not conclude that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is taking refuge in the prospect of a prosecution. He is merely saying that certain matters are subject to investigation for a possible prosecution, about which it would not be sensible to comment at this stage.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Following the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) about Lithuania, will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that the Foreign Secretary, in a statement after the weekend EC meeting, makes it perfectly clear that the Government endorse the view of the United States President that Lithuania enjoys an unequivocal right to self-determination, and that the western European powers will provide practical assistance in every reasonable way?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is here, and will have listened to that point. He will certainly consider with me the possibility of a statement about the matter next week, and he certainly bears in mind my hon. Friend's points of argument.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When we have a debate on the Iraqi gun, as the Leader of the House implied that we should, will it be in order to point out that the reasons why we have this shambles are the free market philosophy operated by the Government and the fact that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has gone on record on many occasions as saying that he wants to see the Department of Trade and Industry completely abolished? It is because he has not been keeping his eye on things that we have this mess now.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There were two misunderstandings in that short observation. First, I gave no suggestion of a prospect of a debate on the matter. Secondly, it is foolish to contend that the possibility of promoting the supply of arms to any customer is greater or lesser under any given pattern of economic organisation. By definition, such activities take place covertly and such people set out to find arms wherever they can. It is always the task of the Government to try to detect that, but it is by no means easy.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Could my right hon. and learned Friend find time for a debate on tourism? Some months ago, a decision was made to exempt people who run bed-and-breakfast businesses from the uniform business rate for up to 100 days a year. That has created a major burden for others in the industry, especially in my constituency. We have not had a tourism debate for a considerable time, so will my right hon. and learned Friend please find time for a debate as soon as possible?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am not sure about the prospect of a debate on tourism. However, my hon. Friend will see that the uniform business rate is one of the subjects selected by the Opposition for debate next Wednesday.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Bearing in mind the fact that virtually every newspaper today carries comments by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller) that someone in Whitehall has been lying about the export order for Iraq, is not it essential that we have a statement early next week from the Secretary of State for Defence or the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry? The statement should tell us precisely what the responsibilities of those Departments were when the hon. Member for Bromsgrove made representations on behalf of a firm in the west midlands and when that firm said that the pipes might well not be pipes, but parts of a gun. Surely the House of Commons is entitled to know about those matters. Why is there this cover-up, evasion and deceit from Ministers and everyone else on this matter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman should not dramatise the matter in that way. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made a statement to the House yesterday. The possibility of a criminal offence is being investigated in the light of some of his observations. It is entirely proper that that should happen.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the pressure on time today, I ask hon. Members not to ask questions that have already been asked and answered, but to ask about business next week.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Is not it a little quixotic that the House found a whole day to debate the breach of some informal rules by one Conservative Member, but is still unable to find time to debate the conduct of 31 Labour Members who are breaking the law? Does my right hon. and learned Friend further agree that the inaction of the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I asked for one question per Member.

Mr. Brazier: The inaction of the Leader of the Opposition on the subject is incredible.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend. The important point that he raises has been raised frequently in the House, and rightly so.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Will the Home Secretary be making a statement next week on some of the recent decisions in courts in the Irish Republic—particularly the decision in the Dublin criminal court which was reported in a Dublin newspaper on 1 April, in which a person who was up for a stabbing offence was told that he must go to England to take a job immediately? Is there a "sin bin" here? Are our immigration laws so open that people can come here to escape justice?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The matter to which the hon. Gentleman refers is not one of the more familiar cases in the Irish jurisdiction, but I shall certainly bring it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, following the Opposition's choice of the community charge as the subject for debate next Wednesday, it is high time that the Government found time for a time for a debate on the future of local government organisation, as it is becoming increasingly clear that two tiers of local government are unnecessarily wasteful and that the present system causes confusion, with district councils being blamed for overspending by county councils?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I understand my hon. Friend's point. The present arrangements certainly can give rise to such misunderstandings, but I would hesitate to conclude that that in itself is sufficient to persuade us to embark on the wholesale reform of local government.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Is the Leader of the House aware that the poll tax of £297 set by my council, Calderdale, was 34th from the bottom of the league and that, when the charge is capped, it will be fourth from the bottom? May we have a full day's debate on the matter, so that the Secretary of State for the Environment can explain how he arrived at the ludicrous decision to cap Calderdale council?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained, his approach was founded on the principles that he set out to the House when he made his statement. The hon. Lady will be able to raise the matter in next week's debate.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): My right hon. and learned Friend will remember that, on 29 March, the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) called for a debate on Barnet's housing policy, claiming that the chief solicitor had said that Barnet council was liable for prosecution under the Race Relations Act 1976. May we have such a debate soon, as the head of legal services of Barnet council claims that he said no such thing? Is not it disgraceful that the hon. Member for Brent, East should make such misleading statements?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I confess that I do not have the details of the matter at my fingertips to quite the same extent as my hon. Friend, but I am grateful to him for reminding me of the subject.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Can we have a debate on no-strike agreements? Does the Leader of the House think that it is fair that those who provide cheap labour in the dining rooms and elsewhere in the Refreshment Department of the House should be prevented from taking industrial action? Is that fair, given that they earn so little?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That matter, so often raised by the hon. Gentleman, will be considered by the House of Commons Commission shortly.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): My right hon. and learned Friend will know that this year is Tidy Britain Year. May we have an early debate on tidiness and keeping litter off our streets, especially as I am sorry to have to report that I have received a complaint from her worship the mayor of Weymouth and Portland that she has seen the House with litter strewn all over its floors? Should not we be setting an example? I should be most grateful if we could have a debate on this subject.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I know that, over the centuries, many people have had some sympathy with that view, but I fear that the House's deplorable habit of occasionally leaving paper behind could not be corrected very quickly.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Has the Leader of the House had time to look at the 14 private Bills set down for consideration today and again deferred until next Thursday? Does he recall that, about six months ago, he told the House that he would be urgently considering the whole question of private business? Is not it time that he reported back to the House and told us what progress he has made in that investigation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to remind me of the matter. He knows that I am engaged in discussions about it, and I hope to report to the House before long.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree with me that, now that the Russians have admitted to the massacre of 15,000 Polish officers in Katyn Wood, it would be right for the House to have a debate on the Polish Resettlement Act 1947, and that the best memorial that the British taxpayer could erect to those gallant murdered officers would be to provide financial aid to Polish people who settled in this country and who now wish to return to their native land?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have not had an opportunity to consider that proposal. I will draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friends for further consideration.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Can the Leader of the House arrange for a statement to be made by the Secretary of State for Defence next week before Operation Elder Forest begins? That operation will subject many areas, especially the north-east of Scotland, to further bouts of low-flying aircraft. Does the Leader of the House understand that, next week, Scottish schoolchildren will be taking certificate examinations and that next Wednesday they will sit the English exam, one of the most popular exams, when the exercise will be at its height?

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Secretary of State for Defence explain why the exercise has been arranged for such an inconvenient time and also tell us who was responsible for organising it for next week?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I can only draw that matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, and I will do so.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Since some of the issues are outwith the Select Committee on Members' Interests, and since he phoned me asking for an apology about a question that I had asked on American complaints about him, before it festers any further, could the position of the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) be clarified by a statement from the Secretary of State for Defence about the complaints received—or not—by the Ministry of Defence?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As I understand it, those matters are being investigated by the two Select Committees concerned. However, I will bring the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-East): Will the Leader of the House clarify the reply that he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) earlier about the debate on Tuesday? Many of us have heard rumours about how the Leader of the House particularly intends to address the voting patterns. It seems to some of us that, if those rumours are true, in addition to giving way to pressure to include that matter—which many of us believe is far outwith the terms of the Bill—the Leader of the House is in fact giving way to other pressures so that the House will not be able to approach the issue in a fair and open-minded way, but would have a strong bias built into it.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Lady will know that the way in which that matter is being handled has, as I have said already, been the subject of the widest possible consultation. Decisions about management will be taken by the Chair and by the Business Committee. It is my impression that the approach that I have so far outlined has the support of the majority of hon. Members.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): As was implicitly recognised in a written answer just before the Easter recess, the Prime Minister and other Ministers have inadvertently misled the House on a number of occasions because of the poverty statistics with which they have been provided. Ministers have been provided with statistics that appear to show that the poorest people in our communities have become more prosperous at twice the rate of the community as a whole. The Government now tell us that that is almost diametrically opposite the truth, and that their rate of increased prosperity has actually been less than that in the country as a whole. As Government policy has presumably been predicated on the false assumption that the statistics provided by the Prime Minister were correct, may we have a statement on the whole affair?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I doubt whether that is an appropriate question for business questions, but I shall bring the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. The Government set out the matter quite clearly in the written answer to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as a former Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, share the concern of friends and families, including Jill Morrell, of British hostages? While supporting a policy of no deals, they are nevertheless concerned about the urgency that they believe the Government attach to solving the problem. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in his capacity as Leader of the House, offer an early opportunity for the Government at least to give an indication that they attach urgency and priority to reaching a conclusion to that serious problem—in spite of the delicacy of the matter, which the House will accept?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I fully understand why the friends and families of people who have been hostages for a long time feel continuous anxiety of the kind to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I must reassure him and them that that topic is almost never absent from the minds of Foreign Secretaries and Foreign Office Ministers. It is a matter of great and continuing anxiety to see whether there is anything further that can be done to explore possibilities. For reasons that the hon. Gentleman will understand, it is not always sensible to advertise that continuing concern with the matter. He can assure all those concerned that the Foreign Secretary and his Ministers share their anxiety.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c

Ordered,

That the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Amendment) Order 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 758) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Points of Order

4.5 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The point of order relates to the Procedure (Debate on Matters Awaiting Judicial Decision) resolution, which the House passed on 23 July 1963. You may recall that yesterday the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said:

> "I cannot answer detailed questions without prejudicing the rights of people who may be on trial."—[Official Report, 18 April 1990; Vol. 170, c. 1429.]

In spite of that, this morning, the Yorkshire Post reported that Customs and Excise are "not actively considering prosecutions".

However, this is not a matter for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry because, on the date to which I have referred, the House passed, without Division, a resolution setting out the circumstances in which matters awaiting judicial decision can be referred to. It states:

> "matters awaiting or under adjudication in all courts exercising a criminal jurisdiction . . . should not be referred to . . . from the time that the case has been set down for trial or otherwise brought before the court".

Therefore, there is a clear definition, The resolution also states:

> "such matters may be referred to before such date unless it appears to the Chair that there is a real and substantial danger of prejudice to the trial of the case."

There therefore seems to be a responsibility on you Mr. Speaker, where a Minister tries to abuse the resolution and to escape the accountability of the House over matters that are his responsibility, that you should make it clear whether it appears to you > "that there is a real and substantial danger of prejudice to the trial of the case"

if a Minister attempts to seek that excuse. However, as there is no case and no trial, no Minister could possibly use that excuse. Surely, therefore, it is incumbent on the Chair to ensure that the terms of that resolution are properly carried out and that a Minister does not try to evade his responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker: There is no question of that matter being sub judice. That was not raised with me yesterday. The hon. Gentleman has quoted Hansard to me, but he will also note that I said at column 1437 that that he could not answer those questions. I never said that it was sub judice.

> "I understood that it was the judgment of the Secretary of State himself"

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are in danger of creating an unwelcome precedent in the House as a result of the conduct yesterday of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who abused the procedures of the House to avoid answering very important questions, to which hon. Members of all parties are entitled to candid, frank and urgent answers. The conduct of the Secretary of State yesterday has been described in one prominent newspaper today as either incompetent or dishonest.

As these matters go right to the heart of the integrity of this Government when answering for their actions in the House of Commons, I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will not simply let this matter slip away, so that such a precedent will have been established. We should have the ability, without an artificial hindrance placed before us by Ministers, to obtain answers to such important questions.

Mr. Speaker: The whole House knows—the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) got it right —that I said yesterday that, provided what Ministers or any other hon. Members say is in order it is not a matter for me. It is not for me to say if the Secretary of State's judgment was correct. I never said that the matter was sub judice, and it is not.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West) rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take Mr. Budgen first.

Mr. Budgen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you give the House your guidance on the second motion relating to the main business of the day, the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill? You will note that the Order Paper contains a motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition:

> "That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House."

Wholly different, separate and important considerations attach to that motion and hon. Members might take a different view on it than on the Second Reading motion. Will there be opportunities for a separate debate on the second motion?

Mr. Speaker: No. The hon. Gentleman has been here a long time and he has often seen these motions on the Order Paper. It is not debatable, but it is certainly votable. I will now take Mr. Skinner. I hope that his point of order will not delay an important debate. The position has marginally improved. Now, only 48 hon. Members wish to take part.

Mr. Skinner: In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and subsequently to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and the Shadow Leader of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), you said that it was not your responsibility, notwithstanding the points that have been made, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South. It is pretty clear to Opposition Members that yesterday we had a Minister present who used the opportunity to cloud the issue and wriggle away from his responsibilities. If in future you spot that and realise that a Minister is trying to use the sub judice rule wrongly, perhaps you could consider giving extra time to hon. Members who want to grill the Minister, instead of allowing him to escape his responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker: I know what the hon. Member is trying to return to—the question of how long I allowed the statement to run yesterday. I hope that some of his hon. Friends who could not speak in the subsequent debate yesterday as a result of points of order had a word with him.

Orders of the Day

British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State, I repeat that there is great pressure to take part in the debate today. In the interests of equity, I proposed to give some precedence to hon. Members who were not called when we last debated this matter in July. I hope that Privy Councillors will understand that they may suffer thereby by being called later on the list. I propose to put a limit of 10 minutes on speeches between 7 and 9 o'clock, but I hope that those who are called before that time will bear that limit in mind in the interests of their colleagues in the House.

4.12 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Waddington): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I hardly need remind the House that, although since the second world war Britain has granted independence to many former colonies, rarely have we had to make plans for handing over a territory to a foreign power, and never to a communist one. I certainly do not have to remind the House that the remarkable story of Hong Kong's economic success is one in which our own country has been and is intimately involved. Quite apart from what many, if not most, of us might regard as our moral duty to maintain the prosperity and stability of Hong Kong up to 1997 and to secure a smooth changeover in that year, Britain has an enormous stake, in terms of trade, investment and jobs, in Hong Kong's continuing success. This is a case, if ever there was one, where duty and the national interest march hand in hand.

It is with Britain that responsibility for Hong Kong rests over the next seven years. We must do our best to see that as long as we remain responsible for the territory, its prosperity and stability are maintained. That is what this Bill is about. I emphasise that our proposals, far from contravening the joint declaration signed in 1984, are designed to carry out the agreement's central purpose, which is to maintain Hong Kong's prosperity and stability in the run-up to 1997.

The Bill addresses a real and present threat to that objective. There are plenty of people who still want to go and live in Hong Kong—largely people without skills wanting to reap the economic benefits of making their homes there—but there are also many people leaving, who include professional, managerial and technical personnel in proportions far in excess of their numbers in the population. Indeed, 24 per cent. of all emigrants come within those categories, but represent only 5·5 per cent. of Hong Kong's population. Thirteen per cent. of Hong Kong's information science professionals—a classification which includes computer experts—have been leaving each year. Hong Kong's economy and stability cannot indefinitely survive such a haemorrhage of talent and enterprise.

The rationale for the proposals now before the House remains as set out by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in his statement on 20 December. First, current rates of emigration and reduced confidence pose a real threat to Hong Kong's stability in the period before 1997. Secondly, most of those who are emigrating do so reluctantly, because it is the only means of acquiring the assurance of a foreign passport. Thirdly, most of them would remain if such an assurance were available without the need to leave Hong Kong.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance to my constituents, most of whom must live in an already overbuilt area and are under severe pressure from Ealing council to build on such green land as remains? Can the Home Secretary assure me that overbuilt areas such as mine will not be pressed into taking even greater populations than they already have to bear and that provision will be made elsewhere?

Mr. Waddington: I shall develop that theme later. First and foremost, this is not an immigration Bill, but a nationality Bill which is designed to anchor people to Hong Kong rather than to encourage them to come here. I certainly assure my hon. Friend that if the people selected were to come here they would have superior skills and be far less likely to concentrate in large numbers in city centres than, perhaps, people with lesser skills.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. and learned Friend has correctly said that the Government's objective is to make it possible for people to stay in Hong Kong. I ask him to put himself in the position of a Hong Kong business man aged between 35 and 40 who has the great good fortune to get a British passport. Such a man, having heard what is being said in communist China now, may feel that that may be a black mark against him when the communist Chinese take over in 1997. Would he not feel disposed to leave Hong Kong early so that he can re-establish his business, his family and his fortune?

Mr. Waddington: I disagree with my hon. Friend. Once a person in a good, well-paid job in Hong Kong has the assurance of a British passport, there is no urgency for him to leave. We must not assume that the worst will happen. Under the joint declaration those who are in Hong Kong after 1997 will have the right to work, the right of abode and the right to travel to and from Hong Kong.

I fully recognise that the remedy which the Bill offers represents an unprecedented departure from the normal principles of our nationality law. We considered carefully whether a scheme leading to entry clearance rather than full citizenship would suffice, but we concluded that such a scheme would not resolve the problem. It would have precisely the opposite effect to that intended and would draw to the United Kingdom the people who were given guarantees. They would be anxious to get their children into Britain while the children were still under age and qualified for entry under the immigration rules. They would be determined to establish the residential qualification for citizenship as soon as possible.

The governor of Hong Kong is convinced that the assurances of citizenship provided in the Bill are the only effective way of restoring confidence and maintaining prosperity, and all the evidence emerging from Hong Kong supports that.

Clause 1 requires the Secretary of State to register up to 50,000 persons recommended by the governor under a scheme approved by Parliament and also to register their spouses and minor children. Clause 3(3) provides for a committee to advise the governor on the operation of the scheme. Obviously in arriving at the figure of 50,000 the governor—rather than the Government—has had to make a difficult judgment, but discussions—

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Sigmund Freud at work.

Mr. Waddington: If the hon. Gentleman would wait just a moment he would not make as big a fool of himself as he did on television last night.

Discussions with Hong Kong since December have reinforced my view that we have got it about right. The figure of 50,000 is a number which is capable of having a real impact on emigration and confidence in the territory, and that is what matters.

Clearly, citizenship granted to the head of a family would be unlikely to anchor him to Hong Kong if citizenship were not granted also to his immediate family, but it is obviously impossible to provide in the Bill for a limit on the number of wives and children. My right hon. Friend has, however, given an estimate of the absolute maximum number of people who might benefit, which is 225,000.

The 50,000 would be a carefully chosen and highly qualified group of people—in good jobs, earning good salaries. If they decided to settle in the United Kingdom they would doubtless have a valuable contribution to make here. But that is not the purpose of the Bill. It is a Bill designed to persuade them to remain in Hong Kong rather than go off elsewhere in the coming years to acquire another nationality as a sort of insurance policy.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): My right hon. and learned Friend talks about establishing confidence and keeping prosperity in Hong Kong. Does he concede that it is important that the Chinese Government should make some moves to ensure that those two attributes stay in Hong Kong? Does he also concede that by putting the Bill before the House he is taking pressure off the Chinese who will see that we are giving relief to Hong Kong while they do nothing?

Mr. Waddington: Obviously there is a joint responsibility. The Chinese Government have a responsibility as a result of what they undertook to do under the joint declaration, but there is also a duty on us. I should have thought that that was plain.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): How will the Bill provide an assurance for the 93·5 per cent. of those eligible under the general allocation section as set out in the explanatory memorandum? That figure ranges from the 79 per cent. of those involved in the information services to the 96·1 per cent. of those involved in the education services who will not receive a passport under the scheme. How will they be encouraged to stay in Hong Kong as a result of the Bill?

Mr. Waddington: We will give assurances to people who play a key role in the Hong Kong economy. Anchoring those people to Hong Kong will help to maintain its stability and prosperity. The maintenance of that prosperity and stability will be to the advantage of all those others who have not been selected under the scheme.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend, who has been extremely generous in giving way. He will know that many of us who have serious misgivings about the Bill are concerned specifically about the numbers who might come here. Many of us are worried that it will be the most dependent rather than the most able who will end up here. They will come with a view to exporting their labour and capital within the European Community after 1992. Those people will have no loyalty or obligation to the country or the Crown. What is the Government's best estimate of the numbers involved? Should we accept such an obligation?

Mr. Waddington: I must remind my hon. Friend that the object of the selection scheme is to ensure that those selected are key workers. Therefore, my hon. Friend is far from the mark when he talks about the less able being selected. The most able will be selected. By definition, those selected will be key workers in responsible jobs, on whom an economy such as that of Hong Kong depends.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Does the Home Secretary accept that the Bill must be seen in the context of the Government's immigration control during the past 10 years? What additional resources is he prepared to give to the posts in Bombay, Islamabad and Karachi where people are having to wait up to six months for an interview in order to join their spouses in this country? What additional resources will he give to process the applications for those waiting for quota vouchers in Bombay? What additional resources will he give to the immigration and nationality department at Croydon, where people have to wait up to two years to get their naturalisation certificates processed?

Mr. Waddington: If my recollection serves me aright, the processing of applications by members of families settled here speeded up last year and more were processed than in the year before. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the settlement figures for last year, he will find that half of all those granted settlement were members of families already settled here. I should have thought that that was a perfect illustration of the generosity of our policy on immigration, in that it has given rights to the families of those who settled here earlier.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): In 1981 we made a political judgment about the number of Chinese residents in Hong Kong who would be genuinely at risk after the transfer of sovereignty. Under section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act 1981 we made specific provision for them. Will that provision be used again or is it to be ended now?

Mr. Waddington: We recognised some time ago, and announced to the House, that some provision would have to be made for those in sensitive posts. The scheme we put into operation then is subsumed in this scheme. The explanatory memorandum about the scheme contains a reference to the sensitive services scheme which will cover the people whom my hon. Friend would wish to see covered.

The Bill is designed to persuade people to remain in Hong Kong rather than go off elsewhere in the coming years to acquire another nationality as a sort of insurance policy. They might come here after 1997 if there were a collapse of confidence in Hong Kong, but in that event many more people from Hong Kong would arrive here seeking refuge. If that happened we would look to the international community for assistance, but, given our historical links with Hong Kong, who can doubt that in a difficult situation the United Kingdom would be expected to take the leading role? The Government believe that the Bill will greatly reduce the chance of such a collapse before 1997 and thus increase the prospects of a successful transition when the time comes.

It would have been unreasonable to ask the House to approve an enabling Bill such as this without revealing how the Government envisaged that the resulting powers would be used. Therefore, I turn to the explanatory note, which I have laid before the House, describing the selection scheme that the Government have in mind.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): If the purpose is to encourage people to stay in Hong Kong, why should not the use of the passports be restricted until 1997? If they can be used immediately, surely that opens the door immediately.

Mr. Waddington: I do not see how that meets th[illegible]. If one announced that one was going to grant passports in 1997 people would go off looking for passports in other countries now, because they would never know how safe was the undertaking that in 1997 another Government would honour the bargain and issue the passports. Having heard the irresponsible nonsense spoken by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) last July, I can well understand why that fear might be present in some people's minds.

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend, but I think that he misunderstood what my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) said. He did not say that the passports should be issued at some time in the future; he suggested, as I have suggested to my right hon. Friend, that the passports should be issued—if the Bill is enacted—in due course and in the normal way, but marked "Valid 1 January 1997". If my right hon. and learned Friend is right and if this legislation is an encouragement to people to stay in Hong Kong, they will not wish to use the passports before 1997, will they?

Mr. Waddington: To issue passports in such an unprecedented form would be an invitation to people to think that the bargain would not be honoured if, through some terrible catastrophe, someone like the right hon. Member for Gorton was the Minister responsible at the time.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Bearing in mind the fact that the Government of the People's Republic of China will not, it appears, recognise this legislation, and hence will not recognise the passports, how will the Bill ensure that the people whom we want to remain in Hong Kong will remain there? Does not my right hon. and learned Friend believe that granting proper democracy to Hong Kong, with a full franchise for all over the age of 18 by 1997, is the way to achieve what we are seeking to achieve?

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has made a statement about moves towards democracy, but there is no point in taking steps that will come to a dead end in 1997, as my right hon. Friend made clear in his statement not so long ago. That is the short answer. In the joint declaration the Chinese Government are committed to allowing people to stay in Hong Kong, to continuing to give them the right of abode there, to continuing to allow them to work there and to continuing to allow them to leave and return there.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): My right hon. and learned Friend will know that I do not share some of my hon. Friends' concerns about the effect of this proposal on United Kingdom immigration policy, but I want to follow up his point about the attitude of the Chinese Government to those who may take up these passports. Is not it plain from the memorandum attached to the 1984 treaty that it was clearly seen by both the British and Chinese Governments that this possibility, if enacted as legislation, would in effect deprive the people taking advantage of my right hon. and learned Friend's proposals of their Chinese nationality? If that is so, how could it possibly make sense to say that we are encouraging people to stay in Hong Kong when, by enacting this legislation, we are virtually making them stateless after 1997?

Mr. Waddington: We are certainly not making them stateless; we are giving them British citizenship—the opposite of statelessness. I must make it plain that in the United Kingdom memorandum we never undertook not to grant British citizenship to people in Hong Kong before 1997. We made it absolutely clear that people who will cease to be British dependent territories citizens in 1997 will be eligible to retain an appropriate status that will not involve a right of abode in the United Kingdom. So what we are doing is entirely in accord with the agreement reached with the Chinese in 1984.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Will my right hon. and learned Friend be kind enough to explain why it is proposed to extend the right to apply for citizenship beyond British dependent territory citizens to holders of Hong Kong certificates of identity and to any of the eligible categories who apply for BDT citizenship before the Bill receives Royal Assent?

Mr. Waddington: It would be unjust if we did not because there is no difference between the qualifications of a person who is already a BDTC and a person who is entitled to become a BDTC but whose application has not yet been processed. Therefore, it would not for one moment be considered fair if one were to put the shutters down on those who by luck rather than good management have become BDTCs now and discriminate against those waiting in the queue.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Before the Home Secretary moves on to the detailed arrangements under the scheme, will he address himself to three particularly vulnerable groups in Hong Kong—the non-Chinese ethnic minorities who will be stateless after 1997, the non-British spouses of British citizens who are in great difficulty and anxiety and the pitiful handful of 24 war widows whose position remains, disgracefully, most uncertain? Will he give the House clear assurances about the safeguards that will be made to protect those three small but vulnerable groups?

Mr. Waddington: If the hon. Gentleman will be patient for a while, I shall deal with the second and third categories. On the first category, the hon. Gentleman will remember that steps were taken some time ago to ensure that no one would be left stateless after 1997, and at the same time an undertaking was given to the non-ethnic Chinese in Hong Kong that if by any chance an individual were to come under severe pressure after 1997 we would consider sympathetically his application to come here.

Let me deal now with the explanatory note which I have laid before the House and which sets out the selection scheme that the Government have in mind. It is the product of extensive discussions with the Hong Kong Government and it is based on principles originally proposed by them.

The scheme that we envisage would be divided into four separate sections. Seventy-two per cent., or 36,200, of the 50,000 places would be allocated under a general section, open to people from a wide range of walks of life who had a key role in maintaining Hong Kong's prosperity and successful administration. They would come from the following seven broad areas of work—business and management, accounting, engineering, information services, medicine and science, law and education. The distribution of places to the various occupational groups within those broad areas would take account of the rate at which their members were emigrating, to focus the assurances where the need is greatest.

A number of places would be set aside for other technically or professionally qualified people who do not fit neatly into the listed occupational groups but who perform essential functions. Applicants in the general allocation section would be marked on a points system taking account of age, experience, qualifications, special circumstances, proficiency in English, British links and community service. Age is important because the scheme is intended to reflect Hong Kong's future need for personnel, and emigration is particularly high in the 30 to 40 age range.

Points for special circumstances would be a means of, for example, recognising exceptional individual achievement or of giving extra weight to occupations suffering higher emigration rates than others within the same group. As to British links, this will include service with a British firm and the Bill does not, therefore, contain provisions for a secondment scheme as originally envisaged. How best to give assistance to British companies will no doubt feature in our detailed discussions on the Bill.

A points system is not familiar to us in Britain, but it is well understood in Hong Kong as a result of its use by the Australian and Canadian immigration authorities, and considerable work has gone into devising one which would be as fair and objective as possible, with the governor's advisory committee playing an important and impartial role. The Independent Commission Against Corruption, which will be represented on the advisory committee, has already been involved in designing the way in which the points system will operate, and will monitor the practical application of this as of other aspects of the scheme.

The second section of the scheme is for key entrepreneurs. The House knows that Hong Kong has a number of well-known and respected entrepreneurs who have extensive investments there, who employ substantial numbers of people and whose departure would do much to undermine confidence. We therefore envisage that the scheme would reserve a small number of places—not more than 1 per cent. of the total—for people in that category.

The third section would provide places for Hong Kong's disciplined services—that is, the police, prison, immigration, customs, fire and auxiliary air force services, as well as the Independent Commission Against Corruption and the garrison. Places will be allocated to those services in proportion to their staff numbers. Applicants will be assessed on a points system, similar to that already described but adjusted to take account o. the needs of each service.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Is the Home Secretary aware that Donald Tsang, the chief administrator of Hong Kong, has estimated that 750,000 people will apply for passports—15 times as many as the number of passports available under the scheme? Will not that have a very destabilising effect on Hong Kong?

Mr. Waddington: I have made this point already, and I do not think that it needs repeating. The fact remains that the selection of 50,000 key personnel who are essential to the good government of Hong Kong and the management of its economy will stabilise Hong Kong, keep it prosperous and thus provide an incentive for the rest of the people to stay.

Finally, the sensitive services section will provide for people who, as a consequence of service to Hong Kong or United Kingdom interests in either a civilian or military role, would be especially vulnerable or exposed after 1997.

This is a scheme for key workers, not for a wealthy and influential elite. It makes provision for teachers, doctors, nurses, engineers, computer programmers, accountants, business managers, civil servants, policemen and the like, and reactions in Hong Kong so far lend no credence to the claim that it is considered elitist or divisive there. It is—as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) wisely said yesterday—selective, and that is its object. It is seen in Hong Kong as a scheme that will contribute to the stability and prosperity of the territory, and will therefore benefit the community as a whole.

There are two other groups of people whom I should mention—and about whom I was questioned a few moments ago—who are not covered by the Bill but for whom I believe some provision must be made. I refer to the widows and widowers of British citizens who were resident in Hong Kong. I am prepared to offer an assurance that they will be allowed to come here if they are still resident in Hong Kong, have not the citizenship of another country and have not remarried. They would, of course, have been able to come here anyway under the immigration rules during the lifetimes of their spouses. In accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, the same assurance will extend to the widows of former service men who served in defence of Hong Kong during the second world war under the Government of Hong Kong, and they will be able to come here irrespective of the husband's nationality.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. and learned Friend has said that the objective of the measure is to enable people to stay in Hong Kong, but if people have British passports when they come into Britain the fact is not registered. How will we know how many of those 50,000—or 225,000—actually come to reside here? How will we know how successful my right hon. and learned Friend's prediction has been?

Mr. Waddington: The Hong Kong authorities keep a careful check on people who leave Hong Kong and are absent for more than six months. Obviously, if a person is granted British citizenship he is not liable to immigration control, but a check would be kept of those who left Hong Kong with British passports. I think that that meets my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The Home Secretary has not touched on the context of the measure and, in particular, the recommendation of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee that it should be seen in an international context. What developments have taken place in his touting for support from other European countries, and especially from the United States?

Mr. Waddington: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will deal with that at length in his final speech, so I shall leave it to him.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): My right hon. and learned Friend has not dealt with the question about the non-United Kingdom spouses of British citizens. Unless something is done, they will be in the curious position of being treated worse than the Hong Kong spouses of Hong Kong citizens are at present. Their numbers are very small. Will my right hon. and learned Friend say a word about that?

Mr. Waddington: There is no difficulty, provided that their husbands are still alive. Wives of British citizens will have an absolute right to come here under the immigration rules. The problem arises in the case of those who are widowed, and who have therefore lost their opportunity to come here under the immigration rules.

My right hon. Friend seems worried by my reply, so I shall let him have another go.

Mr. Channon: I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. and learned Friend again, but may I ask him to check the position carefully? I understand that spouses must have three years' residence here. That entirely defeats the object of the Bill, as it means that families will have to leave Hong Kong rather than being encouraged to stay.

Mr. Waddington: With respect, my right hon. Friend is confusing two separate matters. Spouses will have an absolute right to enter the country, although three years' residence will be required after that for them to obtain British citizenship. They will not need British citizenship to have the assurance that they can come here at any time during the lifetime of their spouses. The difficulty arises only if they are widowed, and that is why I am making special provision for people in such circumstances.

In conclusion, I should refer to suggestions that the Bill either betrays the Government's lack of confidence in the joint declaration or will reinforce uncertainty about the future among those not selected. I do not believe that either allegation stands up to scrutiny. It is a fact of life that, following the events in China last June, confidence in Hong Kong declined to a low ebb. The Bill is designed to tackle that problem; far from undermining confidence, it will bolster it.

As for the Chinese, they have not said anything to suggest that they will fail to honour their side of the joint declaration, and under the terms of the declaration it will be incumbent upon the Chinese Government after 1997 to go on allowing Hong Kong residents with British citizenship to continue to live and work in Hong Kong, and to have free movement in and out of the territory. That is clearly set out in paragraph 3(4) of the joint declaration, and in section XIV of annex 1 thereto.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has taken pains to explain to the Chinese our reasons for introducing the proposals, and we believe that they will in time come to accept them as a sincere contribution to Hong Kong's successful transition to Chinese sovereignty. It is also profoundly to Britain's advantage to secure such a transition. That is why the Bill serves the joint interests of the British people and of the Queen's subjects in Hong Kong. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): It is less than a year since the slaughter in Tiananmen square, so it is easy enough to understand the apprehension with which the people of Hong Kong anticipate the handing over of the colony to China in seven years' time. That apprehension is, I believe, felt by all the people—more than 5 million residents, including more than 3·25 million British dependent territories citizens.

There cannot be a solution to the problems of the colony and the confidence of the residents that does not address the needs of all the people, not just a few. There can be no just or even practical solution in a scheme that offers a special escape route to a favoured and arbitrarily chosen minority. Selection emphasises the existence of the problem, but offers no way out of it for the majority of Hong Kong residents. The real solution—the only solution that meets the needs of all the people—is to make major progress towards democracy in the colony and to make it so complete and tightly organised that dismantling it in 1997 would be virtually impossible. That is the policy that the Labour party advocates and will pursue in government.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): To how many Hong Kong Chinese would the Labour party give United Kingdom passports or the right of abode in this country?

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. Gentleman anticipates a subject that I shall address in a moment. It is not our view that such matters are best decided by thinking of a number first and working out the categories afterwards.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): So the only thing that the Labour party will offer the people of Hong Kong is democracy. Has the right hon. Gentleman then not learnt anything from the experience of Tiananmen square? Democracy is not a magic wand to be waved in front of a Chinese tank. It needs to be supported by something; it must be supported by the right of those people to leave as they wish with British passports and come to Britain. Why does the Labour party hand democracy to Hong Kong with one hand and damage and wound it with the other?

Mr. Hattersley: The right hon. Gentleman will understand in a calmer moment that I am about to address some of the questions that he has asked me. But as he has intervened, let me make one thing absolutely clear. It seems to me that the most cynical policy of all is to pretend to offer entry to every citizen of Hong Kong on the basis and understanding that most of them will not take up that right. That sounds very noble when spoken in a single sentence, but it is not a policy that bears a moment's moral or intellectual examination.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Would my right hon. Friend not agree that it is somewhat cynical also to pretend that a Labour Government could introduce greater democratisation in Hong Kong against the Basic Law which has been passed with the support of Hong Kong delegates' votes? How does he possibly argue that a Labour Government could introduce that democratisation?

Mr. Hattersley: I propose to argue in a little detail, if given the chance, that the next Labour Government will pursue the path towards democracy at the speed that the people of Hong Kong have always asked for and that was once offered to the people of Hong Kong by the present Government. The Government have flinched from making adequate progress towards full democracy. I believe that the Bill is intended to disarm the most vocal and influential minority and therefore make it easier for the Government to follow that craven course. The Bill is the alternative to the progress towards democracy which Hong Kong needs and deserves.

John Walden, the former director of home affairs in the Hong Kong Government, has no doubt where the root cause of falling confidence lies. Writing in today's The Times, he says:

> "within a year of Parliament's endorsement of . . . agreement"— of the joint declaration with China in December 1984—

> "Foreign Office officials had secretly agreed to China's demand that Britain slow down its plans for democratic reform."

He continued:

> "The collapse of confidence in the future of Hong Kong was precipitated not by the tragic events in Tiananmen Square in June 1989 but by Britain's failure to stand up to China in November 1985 and to secure the political safeguards written into the Joint Declaration."

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment, but I should like to make some progress first. I promise to bear him in mind.

Mr. Whitney: I am most grateful.

Mr. Hattersley: It has been claimed that the Bill discharges a debt of honour that we owe to the people of Hong Kong. However, no one explains how a debt of honour to 5 million people, 3·25 million of them British dependent territories citizens, can be repaid by selecting 50,000 of their number for special treatment. It has been claimed, in contradiction of opinion within Hong Kong, which I shall presently quote, that the Bill will increase confidence in the colony. However, no one explains what effect the Bill will have on the confidence of the overwhelming majority of residents who will not benefit from its provisions. The Bill legitimises the fear that an escape route is needed after 1997, but it offers the chance to escape to less than one resident in 20. There is not and cannot be such an escape route for the majority of the colony's residents. If general confidence is increased by the measure, it will be the first time that the morale of the other ranks has been improved by the announcement that the officers will retreat first.

Mr. Whitney: The right hon. Gentleman quoted with approval the article by John Walden in The Times today. Is he aware that Mr. Walden suggested that China's opposition is the best reason why the Government's Bill should be supported today? Does he therefore accept Mr. Walden's proposition?

Mr. Hattersley: I certainly accept Mr. Walden's proposition that the Bill is the best that we could get from the Government. Mr. Walden is saying that a very small amount of help is better than no help at all. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can tell me whether he accepts Mr. Walden's package in total or whether he accepts only part of it. As he had a hand in these matters some years ago, I suspect that he knows very well the betrayal of Hong Kong by the British Foreign Office.

Mr. Whitney: Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, I take Mr. Walden's proposition seriously and I take the issue seriously, which the right hon. Gentleman is failing to do. Certainly it is right that we should stand up to Peking, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary suggested. The way to stand up to Peking and to make the Chinese Government understand their own interests is to pass and support the Bill. The way not to do that is to opt out and cop out of the issue in the way in which the right hon. Gentleman and apparently the majority of the Labour party intend to do.

Mr. Hattersley: I return to opinion in Hong Kong on the subject of the Government's plans. Mr. Lee Cheuk Yan of the Pro Democracy movement said that the Bill is "only for 50,000 households . . . so for the majority of Hong Kong people is irrelevant."

That view, according to opinion polls, is shared by a vast majority of Hong Kong residents, as 90 per cent. of executives, professionals and entrepreneurs, the people whom the Bill is supposed to benefit, say that the Bill will not promote stability, and 88 per cent. of young Hong Kong residents—the future of the colony—regard it as of no significance. Most people in Hong Kong believe in a united territory which will move towards the genuine democracy and the Bill of Rights that will give reality to the concept of "two systems within one nation" after 1997.

The Government have chosen the diametrically opposite course. They have divided the colony between the favoured minority and the disregarded majority. No doubt they believe that by promising passports to Hong Kong's most vocal and influential residents, that has muted their opposition to the Government's failure to make proper progress towards the full democracy that Hong Kong needs and wants. The Office of the Members of the Executive and Legislative Councils was unanimous in calling for, a year ago, 20 elected members by 1991, 30 in 1995 and a fully elected Assembly in 2003.

Despite his predecessor's fine talk about the pace of democratic development reflecting the wishes of the whole community, the Foreign Secretary no longer even aspires to those figures and that result. Instead, he bends to the wishes of the Peking Government, and only half the Assembly's members will be elected by 2003. I want to ask him a direct question on this subject. Did the Prime Minister make any promises about Hong Kong when she dined, secretly as she thought, with the Chinese ambassador two weeks ago? Within 10 months of the Tiananmen square massacre, the Prime Minister was accepting Chinese hospitality. What hopes we had of the Prime Minister and the Government standing up for democracy in Hong Kong were extinguished when we discovered how she had spent her evening three weeks ago, allegedly in secret.

The Foreign Secretary's wish to accommodate China, which must be putting at risk the promised Hong Kong Bill of Rights, is a denial of the principle that his predecessor so often asserted—Britain's determination that it would not abdicate its right to govern Hong Kong in Hong Kong's interests before 1997. The Foreign Office and the Bill are now dividing Hong Kong to facilitate Chinese rule. The first step that Labour will take will be to increase confidence within the colony by moving towards real democracy at the pace demanded by the people of Hong Kong.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Speaking on radio not many days ago, the right hon. Gentleman said, presumably while trying to play to the anti-immigration lobby in Birmingham, that the Labour party, if given the opportunity, would limit the number of people allowed into this country. He further said that he did not know how or how many. Has he had time to think since and does he now know how and how many?

Mr. Hattersley: Let me assure the hon. Gentleman about something that even he, on reflection, will understand. Whatever else is represented by the Member of Parliament for Sparkbrook, it is not the anti-immigration lobby.

We do not intend now, or ever, to play the numbers game. There are a number of people in express and specific categories who in our view deserve the right to enter Britain. In a moment, I shall describe those categories, but we leave the numbers game to those who used to be led by the Home Secretary until he was coerced into supporting the Bill.

I shall describe in a moment how we shall deal with immigration from the colony, but first I want to make it clear that under no circumstances will we introduce a system that requires residents, in theory equal before the law, to compete with each other for a limited number of passports. The system that the Government propose is arbitrary and divisive. Its effect will be capricious and its result will be unavoidably unjust.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: Not for the moment.

The Bill proposes that 50,000 individuals should be granted British citizenship. Why 50,000? Why not 40,000, 60,000 or 70,000, as the Foreign Secretary originally proposed? We know the honest answer to the question: 50,000 is the compromise between what the Foreign Secretary wanted and what the Home Secretary was prepared to agree. But, and I hope that the Foreign Secretary will answer the question precisely when he replies to the debate, what is the official explanation of 50,000? What is to be said to the men and women who just fail to qualify and who know that they are on the margin of qualification because they have compared their ratings in the absurd points scheme that the Government propose and have realised that they just missed out compared with more successful applicants? Why will they be told that only 50,000 will be allowed?

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Hattersley: Not for the moment. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members who vote for the Bill——

Mrs. Currie rose——

Mr. Hattersley: The rule is that when I say that I shall not give way, the hon. Lady must sit down.

I hope that right hon. and hon. Members who will vote for the Bill tonight have studied the points scheme, by which British passports will be distributed. British citizenship is to be awarded on the basis of a calculation that most urban district councils would regard as too crude for the allocation of council houses. I invite hon. Members who doubt that judgment to read paragraph 23 of the proposed scheme:

> "In the event that a number of candidates scored equal points and all could not be accommodated within the places available for each group, the Governor would have discretion to choose whom to recommend for citizenship."

An urban district council that gave such power to a housing manager would be driven out of office. The Home Secretary understated the case when he told us that this is an unprecedented way of awarding British citizenship.

The House is being invited to take or leave the points scheme. It is being denied any opportunity to amend it. It is not part of the Bill, but as it clearly will not be changed year by year there is no reason why it should be hidden away in secondary legislation, except the Government's hope that debate on the contents of the points scheme can be hidden away in a 90-minute debate late one night. Given the scheme's contents, that is hardly surprising.

I give another example of the scheme's absurdity, to which I hope the Foreign Secretary will give an explicit answer tonight. Paragraph 34 of the scheme suddenly begins to refer to heads of households, 50,000 of whom will be granted British citizenship. How is a head of household defined? Is it a man? Is it the highest wage earner? If a woman earns less than her husband but qualifies in the scheme through education and experience, can she still be granted British citizenship?

What about children? Paragraph 34 says that children under 18 will not be allowed to accompany their parents if the Home Secretary is not satisfied as to their good character. Are the Government serious about that? Are they saying that when all the paraphernalia have been gone through, when the committee has sat, when the governor has recommended and when the Home Secretary has rubber-stamped the decision, somebody will say "You and your spouse can come, but your children under 18 are not, in the Home Secretary's judgment, of good character." Is this a serious scheme, or was it simply cobbled together overnight?

If the scheme were simply ludicrous, the tragedy would not be so great, but it is also arbitrary and contradictory in a way that should disqualify it from serious consideration. In The Times today, Mr. D. A. White of Hong Kong described one of its consequences, to which I hope the Home Secretary will listen. May I have the Home Secretary's attention?

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you clarify for the House whether this is a debate or a statement from the right hon. Gentleman? Is it not time that he gave way to a Conservative Member?

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Is it on the same point?

Mr. Bell: I am seeking your protection as a Back Bencher. We are trying to listen to the debate, but Conservative Members are consistently intervening without any sanction from the Chair. I do not wish to challenge you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but we require the protection of the Chair against those who are deliberately disrupting the proceedings of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Home Secretary and the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) have been generous in giving way, but I remind the House that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak. Interventions inevitably prolong speeches.

Mr. Hattersley: I hope that the Home Secretary will concentrate on the example that I propose to give him in a moment as it reveals that he was wrong in fact in an answer that he gave earlier. Mr. D. A. White of Hong Kong wrote to The Times this morning describing the contrary consequences of the Bill. Mr. White is British; his wife is Hong Kong-born Chinese. As a result of the iniquities of our general immigration law, Mr. White does not have an unqualified and unfettered right to bring his wife to this country. The Home Secretary said that he did. In fact, Mr. White has the right to apply to bring his wife here, but she has to pass a number of tests, such as the primary purpose rule, to come to this country. Mr. White points out that if he were not British, but a British dependent territories citizen, he would certainly qualify for the points scheme and would thereby acquire the unfettered and unqualified right to bring his wife to this country. He says that he is penalised by the fact that he is British. He says finally that if he died before his wife, she would lose even the residual right to apply and to be examined. That does not seem right and I hope that the Home Secretary or the Foreign Secretary will justify such an anomaly.

Anyone who has residual doubts about the Government's fear that the points scheme is literally indefensible needs to read no further than clause 1(5). It says:

> "Neither the Secretary of State nor the Governor shall be required to give any reason for any decision made by him in the exercise of a discretion vested in him or under this Act and no such decision shall be subject to appeal or liable to be questioned in any court."

British citizenship is to be handed out according to a points scheme, which turns out, on examination, to be run not by the governor, but by a group of Hong Kong officials who may well themselves be applicants. The points scheme would be ridiculous were it not wicked. However, the comparison, which I made a few moments ago, with local authority housing allocation may have been unfair. No housing points scheme could be so subjective or crude. No housing committee would deny an aggrieved applicant the right of appeal. No local authority would be allowed to avoid judicial review of its housing allocation, yet all those iniquities and absurdities are built into the scheme by which the right to be British is granted by a committee of Hong Kong officials and then rubber-stamped by the Foreign Secretary and the governor of Hong Kong.

Mrs. Currie: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: The injustices inherent in the scheme were unavoidable once the Government decided on the principle—if "principle" is the right word—on which the Bill is based. The Government decided on a number and then had to decide how the total was made up. If the Government were determined to have a selective scheme, they should have begun by deciding which categories of residents they were prepared to allow to come to Britain and the number of entrants would then have been the total within those prospective categories.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: We know that the Government chose the figure of 50,000 men and women of special merit and—

Mrs. Currie: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Couchman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give way to the hon. Lady.

Mrs. Currie: It is noticeable in the House that the right hon. Gentleman is ploughing through his notes with his head down. I am glad—and grateful to him—that he has at last raised his head to answer a question. Is it not a matter of logic from what he is saying that everybody in Hong Kong who wants to come in should have a passport and be able to do so? As that is not acceptable and is unlikely to happen, he is saying that nobody should come. Would it not be better to put his points into a reasoned amendment and to support the Second Reading tonight?

Mr. Hattersley: I am sorry that the hon. Lady missed the television at 5.10 pm—[Interruption.] Of course, that is why I waited before giving way. What is right is that those with special needs should be allowed into the country. If she can bear to listen with patience, as the cameras are off, I am about to describe what those categories are and how we should assess them.

The net result of the strange compromise between the Foreign Secretary's pro-consular illusions and the Home Secretary's tabloid populism provides for people coming into this country who do not remotely conform to the criteria that the Government once laid down in the British Nationality Act 1981, such as the criteria of established relationship with this country or a determination to become permanently associated with it. More importantly, this strange, cobbled-together compromise will deny citizenship to men and women who need, deserve and want it. Such iniquities and inequities can be avoided only by the application to Hong Kong of this country's general policy on nationality and immigration—not the policy we have now, which is often unjust and discriminatory, but the immigration policy which we should have and which, under the Labour Government, we will have. Under that policy, there would be no general distribution of passports by Home Secretaries on the basis of schemes cobbled together from dubious principles and divisive practices.

When Lord Whitelaw introduced the British Nationality Bill, the Tory party used to believe that the award of British citizenship should be based on constant principles: birth in Britain, a long period of residence in Britain or a close personal association with Britain. British citizenship should be given away by the Government according to principles, not according to the mood of the moment. That remains our view. We should apply to Hong Kong the compassionate and consistent principles of our published immigration policy. For many of the citizens who thus came to this country, British citizenship might well follow.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I will give way just once more, then I shall obey Mr. Deputy Speaker's injunction to make progress.

Mr. Bruce: The right hon. Gentleman is clearly a well-known international statesman, but he may not be as well known as his right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). The right hon. Member for Gorton said that any right of abode given by this Parliament under the Bill, or under any other, would not necessarily be maintained by an incoming Labour Government. Will the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) repudiate that particular statement?

Mr. Hattersley: Our position on that is clear. If the Bill is passed, we shall, of course, accept its provisions, but, as I have already pointed out to the House, the Bill is so constructed that the scheme that it governs can be changed from time to time. Clearly, the Government would not abandon the right to change the scheme in the Bill and neither would we. If the Bill is passed, we shall respect it. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has never said anything remotely different from that.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): What are your principles?

Mr. Hattersley: I hear the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) say, with the wit and intelligence that I expect from him, "What are your policies?" Under our policy, some Hong Kong residents would qualify immediately for entry into this country. Many of them were recommended for special consideration by the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. Their problems have often been ignored by the Government. Indeed, all four special categories recommended by the Select Committee were ignored by the Government until 4·5 pm today. I am sure that the so-called rebels on the Tory Benches will feel that if they have achieved nothing else in their endeavours, they have got the widows of ex-service men into this country. They have achieved that at least because the Government ran away from them on that particular and progress would not have been made unless the Government had feared defeat this evening.

The Government have not gone far enough. We will offer immediate entry to other groups because they deserve and need it. The Select Committee referred to "non-ethnic Chinese" who are mostly east African Asians who took refuge in the colony 20 years ago and who do not have full rights of residence in Hong Kong. In 1997, they will be stateless. Despite what the Home Secretary said this afternoon, the Government are offering them nothing. They do not qualify under the points scheme. We will grant them entry rights and I repeat that it is our published and established policy to allow the small number of war widows to come to this country. If I welcome nothing else that the Home Secretary said this afternoon, I welcome his concession on those widows and rejoice at his conversion.

We should also—as the Select Committee proposes—accept that time spent as a bona fide student could be included in the qualifying period for naturalisation. As the Select Committee also recommended, we should use section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act 1981 generously.

That section allows the Home Secretary to grant British citizenship to public servants who have worked abroad in colonial administrations. It enables the Government to offer citizenship to public servants of every rank, whereas the points scheme would clearly favour more senior officials. [Interruption.] How do I know? Who asked me how I knew? [HON. MEMBERS: "Langbaugh."] I should have guessed.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: No.

Mr. Holt rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give way in a moment.

Mr. Holt rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I shall gladly give way to the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) if he will tell me the five basic principles of the points scheme that I have cited. Can he do that? [Laughter.]

Mr. Holt: The right hon. Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "One."] The right hon. Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "One."]—and those behind him may think that this debate is funny and that the lives of people in Hong Kong are not important. This is not a game; it is a debate about people's lives and futures and the right hon. Gentleman is not doing Parliament or his party any good by his behaviour this afternoon. I suggest that he is honest with the public and that he stands up and tells the House how many people from Hong Kong the Labour party would allow into Britain.

Mr. Hattersley: It is because I regard this matter as crucial that I reject and resent the fact that hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Langbaurgh will vote for the Bill this evening without understanding the first thing about what is involved.

Some public servants will no doubt wish—perhaps even need—to leave the colony after 1997. We shall certainly enable them to come to Britain. The Home Secretary's discretion—a major feature of both immigration and nationality legislation at present—can and will be used to assist other individuals—I emphasise individuals—who are in particular need of leaving the colony.

On 17 January the Foreign Secretary told the House that as we considered the Bill we should be mindful of our duty to the people of Britain as well as to the people of Hong Kong. It is to the consequences of the Bill for Britain that I shall now address my remarks. It now seems to be the Home Secretary's belief—it has always been the Foreign Secretary's belief—that most of the Hong Kong residents who receive British citizenship will choose not to come to Britain. The announcement by the Government of China that they will not recognise a second or dual nationality seems to me to undermine that conviction. My own view is that most of the 225,000 will not come immediately but will come eventually—in 1996 if they have not emigrated elsewhere. But I repeat that the number is not the issue. What concerns me—it is the nub of my passionate opposition to the Bill—is the damage that will be done to the interests and welfare of the black and Asian British. That damage will be real, practical and immediate.

This is an immigration Bill as well as a nationality Bill. It confers the right of entry into Britain on men and women who do not possess it at present. New rights to new immigration—the extension of immigration—must be seen, at least during the lifetime of this Parliament, against the background of the Government's established immigration policy. About the principles of that policy —if "principles" is the right word—Ministers have been brutally frank. The rigorous control of numbers is said to be essential. The then Home Secretary—now the Foreign Secretary—was explicit in his words to the House on 16 November 1987. These are his words, not mine; they are his opinions, certainly not mine:

"there is a limit to the extent to which a society can accept" ——

Mr. Couchman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: No.

Mr. Couchman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In July the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said in the House that the Labour party recognised that 3¼ million Chinese could not be given the right of abode. On 20 December he said that 50,000 heads of households could not. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a matter for debate. It is not a point of order.

Mr. Hattersley: The then Home Secretary said on 16 November 1987:

"there is a limit to the extent to which a society can accept large numbers of people from different cultures without unacceptable social tensions. That remains our view. It is not an anti-immigrant view; it is a realistic view.

It would not be in the interests of the ethnic minorities themselves if there were a prospect of further mass inward movement. That prospect would increase social tensions, particularly in our cities."—[Official Report, 16 November 1987; Vol. 122, c. 779.]

I repeat that that is the Government's view—the established principle of their immigration policy. Successive regulations have put it into practice. They have had the effect of reducing numbers and Ministers have boasted about it. What is more, adminstrative delays hold back the entry of men and women who are entitled to come here. The Government consistently refuse to allocate sufficient resources to reduce the queue. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) asked questions in the House during the week before the Easter recess. The answers that he obtained about the length of time that it takes, not to obtain the right to come here, but to demonstrate that right, was terrifying.

I have no doubt that if today we gave special priority immigration status to hand-picked residents of Hong Kong, the Government would hold back the entry into Great Britain of men and women with a far greater claim to British nationality. They would contrive more administrative delays and introduce new regulations. They would apply the primary purpose rule more rigorously. I remind the House that that is the rule that gives an immigration officer the power to read a husband's mind and announce that he cannot come to Britain because he is applying not because he wants to be with his wife but because he likes it here or wants a job here. The Home Secretary tells us that this is a Bill aimed at carefully chosen people with good jobs and good salaries. I know very well that he will compensate for that by keeping out people without good jobs and without salaries—husbands and wives who ought to be reunited with their families in Britain.

Men and women with an established right to come here will be passed over in favour of men and women for whom a new and absolute right is being created. Some of the most underprivileged families in Britain will be penalised while help is given to other individuals who, by definition, continue to enjoy a very great advantage.

I remind the House of the people to whom we currently refuse entry to Great Britain. Husbands of British citizens are prevented from joining their wives in this country on the most flimsy and artificial of pretexts. Dependent relatives are deprived of the right to spend their old age with their families. Many special voucher holders—east African refugees who were promised the right to come to Britain 20 years ago—have still not received visas. Perhaps worst of all, children of British citizens were denied entry because they were adjudged, in the notorious phrase, not to be related as claimed. Now DNA tests have proved that the Home Office was wrong—that they are the children of British citizens—but they are still being denied reunion with their families. Every week, I see families who are deperately damaged, materially and emotionally, by those exclusions—families who are separated when they should be together. While such exclusions continue, I do not propose to vote for the priority entry into Britain of men and women who qualify by a committee's judgment of such intangible attributes as "special circumstances; experience and community service".

Mr. Waddington: Now that the right hon. Gentleman has fully developed his argument, we can understand it. He has said, first, that he is worried about the possibility of 50,000 people coming here from Hong Kong because of the effect that it may have on community relations—[HON. MEMBERS: "No. It was you."] No, that is exactly what the right hon. Gentleman said. On the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman said that he would allow some people to come here from Hong Kong. How, in the light of that, can he again refuse to answer the straight question that has been put to him now half a dozen times? If he thinks that 50,000 people coming here would be bad for race relations, but believes that some peple should be allowed to come here from Hong Kong, how many people does he believe should come here from Hong Kong?

Mr. Hattersley: I had no doubt that the Home Secretary would eventually ask me the numbers question because that enables him to support the Bill and still preserve his racist credentials. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] In the meantime—

Mrs. Currie: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I distinctly heard the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) talk about the racist credentials of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. That is surely unparliamentary and it was a disgraceful thing to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the right hon. Gentleman used a phrase that was unparliamentary I am sure that he would wish to rephrase it.

Mr. Hattersley: Of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Had I used a phrase that was unparliamentary, I should, as always, withdraw it without a moment's hesitation. However, the idea that the phrase "racist credentials", which I debase by saying that it is used in every debate on race that we have in this place, is in any way unparliamentary is, to put it simply, stretching it a bit.

I want to ask the Home Secretary a question about his policies.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is there precedent for the proposition that the word "racist" is unparliamentary?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the House will leave those matters to the Chair. There are remarks which some hon. Members find offensive. I did not feel it necessary to ask the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw that particular phrase, but I must tell the House that this is a very serious debate. There are strong emotions on both sides and these interventions prolong speeches.

Mr. Hattersley: The iniquity of what the Government propose for Hong Kong becomes clear when it is compared with the treatment now meted out to British ethnic minorities. For example, we are told—indeed it is the nub and basis of the Bill—that it is right that 50,000 selected Hong Kong residents should be allowed to enter Britain and bring their families with them. That is right because of their uncertainty about the colony's future.

If a Sikh woman from my constituency—Sikh and British—marries a man from the Punjab, that man will be subject to a searching examination of his motives and intentions if he applies to come to this country. If he says that he wants to come to Britain in part because he is uncertain about the future of the Punjab, he will be automatically denied entry to this country according to the primary purpose rule.

Anxiety about the future is a qualification for coming here if one lives in Hong Kong. If one is a husband wishing to join a British wife, anxiety about the future of one's country of origin anywhere else is an automatic disqualification.

I am familiar with the cliche that two wrongs do not make a right. Like most cliches, it is true. However, that cliche does not apply to this situation. Applying the principles of the Bill would do more than leave the black and Asian British in their present state of disadvantage. It would increase their suffering by pushing them further down the queue. Their relatives would be kept out as the new entrants were allowed in.

I have read that the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) has also expressed the view that Asian British living in his constituency would feel a bitter resentment if their husbands, parents, wives and children were kept out of this country while new candidates with no immediate claim on British citizenship were allowed in. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman is right. However, our attitudes towards the problem diverge from that.

For 10 years I have been arguing that husbands, wives and dependent relatives should be allowed into this country. For 10 years the right hon. Member for Chingford has been voting to keep them out. That shows a substantial difference in our attitudes towards the problem. I say to him and to others, whether he votes for the Bill tonight is no concern of mine. I shall vote against it because it is a bad Bill—bad in concept, execution, principle and practice.

Mr. Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I shall support the Government in the Lobby tonight—[Interruption.] Although in the past I have expressed doubts about some aspects of the Bill, I believe that it is the only course now open to the Government. What doubts I had were removed by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley).

I have seldom heard a less convincing speech than that made by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. We respect him because he normally puts forward an honest and convincing point of view from the Opposition Front Bench. However, to say tonight that the problem facing the Government can be solved by an extension of democracy in Hong Kong bears no relation to reality.

In the 1980s, I was one of those who strongly urged the Government to speed up the process of democratisation. I wanted that first stage to have been taken by 1989. However, we were unsuccessful in convincing the Government of that. I do not see now that the situaton in Hong Kong following Tiananmen square can be dealt with by saying that we will extend democratisation.

There is a lack of confidence in some quarters in Hong Kong. It does not exist in all quarters, and it may be exaggerated, but the uncertainty undoubtedly exists. The Government's obligation is to do their utmost to ensure that Hong Kong retains its stability and prosperity until the time comes to hand it over in 1997.

I differ from those who say that we have a moral responsibility to Hong Kong. I have always found it very difficult to understand how international affairs can be run satisfactorily on the basis of a particular chosen morality. The British have made a considerable contribution to the development of Hong Kong and to the welfare of its people. However, if we look at the figures we must also recognise that the Americans and the Japanese have made an even greater contribution in investment and trade. Very well—we do not criticise that, nor do we dispute it. All have contributed. Because we have helped to build up Hong Kong and its people, I cannot see that one can draw from that a moral conclusion as to what we should do now.

Our responsibility is clearly a political and practical one. We must ensure that, when Hong Kong is handed over to the People's Republic of China, it is as stable and prosperous as we can make it. The Goverment have quite rightly addressed themselves to the problem of securing that position. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook failed to address that problem; that was the great weakness of his speech.

I readily agree that there may be difficulties with the present immigration law and that there are anomalies which should be changed. I do not dispute that.

Mr. Hattersley: You were the Prime Minister responsible.

Mr. Heath: Yes, I know. With time, one learns things. All that was 20 years ago. If anomalies have emerged, they can be changed. Nobody is arguing about that.

I see nothing in the Bill that will suggest that those who are waiting for relatives to join them will be affected. I am strongly in favour of those who have an entitlement to come here being granted that entitlement as soon as possible. I have always been in favour of that. Therefore, I do not see any problems arising from the Bill on that aspect of immigrants or the relatives of those who have already settled here coming to this country.

The problem is how to maintain the stability and prosperity of Hong Kong until 1997. The Government's approach has been to try to ascertain how many and who among those who are essential to public services and local services and to management should come here. They have then said, "Very well, we shall arrange for that to happen." I have always been worried about discrimination, but we have to solve the problem of maintaining stability and prosperity, and I believe that this is the only path open to us. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook did not suggest any other.

We have heard that we do not want any discrimination in favour of the wealthy in Hong Kong. In my experience, the wealthy have already made their plans. They have already got out of Hong Kong. They are in Vancouver, building rather disagreeable high buildings in place of the natural type of architecture. They are looking after themselves. We do not have to worry about them and nor do the Government.

Others will seek a passport elsewhere. That is only to be expected until confidence is restored. It will require a period of residence overseas. However, we are also learning that those who have already followed that path and got their external residence are now returning to Hong Kong. If, by 1997, we have solved the bigger problem, to which I shall refer in a moment, those people will continue to remain and to work in Hong Kong because that is where they want to be. They are making the necessary dispositions themselves.

The larger problem relates to the attitude of the People's Republic of China. We are faced with the major task of restoring the relationship between Peking and Westminster and Whitehall and of both sides gaining confidence in each other. There is nothing to be gained from constantly dwelling on the tragedy of Tiananmen square, as did the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] First, because we want to get the Chinese back on the path that they were on before that tragedy. They were being supported by investment and technology from all over the world. They are still being supported by a large amount of investment and technology from all the European countries. Our business men who are already there are continuing as before. What is required is confidence about the future at the political level.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): So we just forget about it, do we?

Mr. Heath: There is nothing to be gained by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who always has a grudge against something or some country, continually muttering under his breath about the tragedy, which we all deplore.

We must build up that confidence, because it will then give confidence to Hong Kong about what will happen after 1997. Therefore, I urge the Government not to despair and not to be dogmatic about this. I urge them not to regard it as an incident that will mean that for years and years we shall be further apart from Peking, but to find a way of moving closer to it so that they can influence it.

Mr. Adley rose——

Mr. Heath: No, I am sorry, but I shall not give way.

The democratic problems are not easy to solve. That was the problem in Tiananmen square. With a population of 1,050 million, it is not easy to say what democracy will be, how the people will vote or who will represent them —[Interruption.] Perhaps Opposition Front Bench spokesmen should take up positions at a university and explain the form of democracy to be brought about in a people of that size whose education has been developed to a high degree only in the past 10 years.

To restore confidence to Hong Kong, we must establish a relationship between London and Peking. That requires action from both sides—from Peking as well as London —if we are to give confidence to the people.

It is said that, if 50,000 families eventually come here, it will be the cause of great disorganisation. Having gone through the experience of the Ugandan Asians, I doubt that. I have heard it said that the Ugandan Asians tore the country apart. They did nothing of the sort. I have been looking up the records; they show that, like the rest of the world, this country felt that the British were doing the right thing in a difficult situation—as we did. We took 29,500 people from Uganda in the course of six weeks— not over a period of seven years. Those who came have been extraordinarily successful in this country, and have contributed an immense amount to it.

One thing on which I have formed a judgment about the Chinese is that, given an opportunity, wherever they are in the world, they will always be successful. It does not matter whether it is in the east end of London or in San Francisco—wherever there is a Chinatown, it is successful. Those who eventually come here will be successful and, I believe, will contribute to the welfare of this country.

I must emphasise that Chinese Governments have kept their undertakings in the past and, I believe, will keep to the undertakings that they have given about Hong Kong. It is said that they did not keep an undertaking about Tibet. However, the fact is that the agreement that was signed between Mao Tse-Tung and the Dalai Lama was broken by the military in Tibet, not by Mao or by the Dalai Lama. Therefore, that is not an example of the Chinese breaking an undertaking that they have signed. I think that they will keep their undertakings.

The Government are doing what is essential at this moment. They should be supported in that. However, they should back up their policy by re-establishing a relationship with Peking that will enable confidence about the future to exist in Hong Kong. If that can be achieved by 1997, some of the fears among my right hon. and hon. Friends and Opposition Members will prove to be groundless. I very much hope that that will be the case.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): As always, it is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), whose speech got to the heart of the Bill and of the bankruptcy of the Labour party's position.

I disagree with the right hon. Gentleman in one area. He said that the events of Tiananmen square are not relevant. I believe that he is wrong there. He is right to say that it is necessary to Hong Kong's future that we establish proper, stable relations with the Chinese Government, but he is wrong to ignore the Tiananmen event, because it is the shadow that hangs over Hong Kong at the moment, and the cause of its instability. It is not irrelevant to record that we are now within six weeks of the first anniversary of that appalling event, in which the Chinese state slaughtered its own young citizens in the main square of its own capital city. Today we are debating and deciding what safeguards and protections we should give our citizens whom we are about to hand over to that same state in a handful of years.

The House need be in no doubt about my party's position on this matter. We have stuck to it through thick and thin and we shall not vary from it now. I must advise the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup that we believe that Britain has a moral duty to honour the rights of all our passport holders in Hong Kong. That is not only the morally right thing to do; it is also the best practical thing to do. It provides the best way of ensuring Hong Kong's stability until 1997, and of preserving and protecting its democracy and prosperity after 1997. We believe that, if Britain had shown leadership and imagination, it would have been possible. It may still be possible to secure the international guarantees and agreements that would have reinsured our responsibilities to our passport holders with friendly countries in Europe, the Commonwealth and north America.

I wish to stress two points. First, as the Home Secretary properly said, we need to understand that the Bill is not an emigration policy for Hong Kong. It is a policy to discourage emigration from Hong Kong. It is about taking the measures that will give the people of Hong Kong the confidence to stay where they want to stay—in a free and capitalist Hong Kong. Secondly, we need to understand that Hong Kong is different from any matter on which the House has previously legislated. The House has legislated many times to transfer sovereignty over lands and people to self-government. But we have never handed a people over, most of them against their will, to another state, let alone a state from which many of them fled in fear of their lives.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup sought to argue that to allow the freedom of our citizens to be bartered away over their heads carried no moral obligation. I believe that it does carry obligations, and that it would be better if we faced up to them.

There was a time when Britain would have recognised those obligations and acted on them. In so doing, we should have won the respect of the whole world and furthered our interests in Hong Kong and the far east. But, since the Tiananmen square massacre, the activities of Ministers have fallen far short of that great tradition. They have ducked and weaved, moved forwards and backwards, hinted and warned, but they have never provided the leadership on this issue that was necessary even to make their own party recognise the gravity of the position.

Even now, the arguments that Ministers advance for not doing more for Hong Kong are the most disreputable that any Government could hide behind. When I hear Ministers say, "We should awfully like to do more for the people of Hong Kong but Parliament will not allow us to," I hear the clear echo of doublespeak. As if this Government had ever listened to the voice of Parliament. That is not leadership but the abdication of leadership.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I hope that the House will understand that I have several points to make in my speech. I have no wish to detain the House longer than is necessary. I listened to the wise words of Mr. Speaker. I wish to allow other hon. Members the chance to speak. I shall give way to two interventions, one from the hon. Gentleman and the next intervention that I receive.

Mr. Field: I am genuinely obliged to the right hon. Member for giving way. He was talking about doublespeak. Can he tell the House why, in a campaign for a parliamentary election, the Liberal party tried to besmirch my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) when he stood as candidate for the Isle of Wight by suggesting that he had a black girl friend and was living with a black woman? Where was the doublespeak on that issue?

Mr. Ashdown: That was such an awful intervention that I shall give way to two more.

What arguments are advanced by those who would not uphold honouring the full rights of all passport holders in Hong Kong? First, they say that Britain could not possibly grant right of abode to 3 million people. Let me remind the House that in 1987, when we passed the Single European Act, we granted right of abode in Britain to 250 million people. Where is the high moral principle that makes it acceptable to grant right of abode to 250 million people who live only a handful of miles from these shores, when we are told that it is unacceptable and dangerous to grant it to the tiniest fraction of that number who live 8,000 miles away but happen mostly to be Chinese? Is the House prepared to go along with so blatantly disreputable an argument?

The second charge against our ideas lies in the assumption that all those who were given right of abode would board their international jets and come to Britain the day after tomorrow. That is arrogant nonsense. Who would wish to leave Hong Kong, which has a higher growth rate, lower unemployment and an immeasurably better ordered society? Do we believe that people in Hong Kong will dash to Britain to enjoy the poll tax, record mortgage rates, a failing economy and social disorder? What a ridiculous notion. [HON. MEMBERS: "To enjoy freedom."]

If what the governor of Hong Kong has called Armageddon were to happen after 1997, a mass exodus would indeed take place. But in those circumstances, the Foreign Secretary has rightly accepted that Britain would have the first responsibility for the welfare of those who would in his words be "refugees". I note that he is nodding.

The difference between the Government's proposals and ours is that the Government would choose to offer sanctuary to penniless refugees on a scale that would dwarf anything that we have seen with the Vietnamese boat people. But we would have them come as free citizens who have, by way of insurance, made preparations by investing in property, jobs and firms in Britain beforehand. That is the difference.

Mr. Adley: I do not want to drag the right hon. Gentleman into the numbers game, but most people who moved to Hong Kong in the past 50, 40 or 30 years were well aware that the lease on the territory ran out in 1997. No one asked them to go to Hong Kong, and no one is asking them to leave. Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that, even though Britain's lease on 97 per cent. of the territory finishes in 1997, we have an obligation in perpetuity? Does he envisage a date 10, 20 or 30 years after 1997 when our obligation would end?

Mr. Ashdown: The purpose of the policy is to ensure stability before 1997 and the survival of democracy afterwards. That means that we have an obligation to those who have British passports when the territory is handed over. It is as simple and easy as that.

Mr. Adley: It is not simple.

Mr. Ashdown: Why not, for those who have British passports? I remind the hon. Gentleman that, three years ago, he voted in the House—I do not know how he voted, but the House voted by an overwhelming majority—to give, not 3 million, but 250 million people right of abode. Did he ask then whether it was in perpetuity?

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashdown: I was looking forward to an intervention from an Opposition Member, but I said that I would give way to two more interventions.

Sir Philip Goodhart: The right hon. Gentleman knows his constituency well. Does he believe that Yeovil could absorb 5,000 or 10,000 immigrants from Hong Kong during the next decade?

Mr. Ashdown: I remind the hon. Gentleman that he did not ask that question when he granted right of abode in Britain to 250 million people. If the hon. Gentleman wants me to say—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I shall give an answer. If, in extremis, the people who are being crushed under the Chinese tanks in Nathan road in 1997 are British passport holders and my responsibility, and if someone asked me or my constituents to give them sanctuary, the unequivocal answer to that I, and probably my constituents, would give would be, "Yes, of course." [Interruption.] May I move on? [HON. MEMBERS: "Move on."]

Even in the circumstances described or alluded to in the hon. Gentleman's question, could Britain accept its obligations? Contrary to all the scaremongering, the evidence is that we could accept those responsibilities. The Corry report, supported by expert research from elsewhere and the writings of economists such as Samuel Brittan, concluded that, with proper preparation, Britain could actually benefit from such immigration, just as we have done in the past.

I stress that that is less likely to happen if we take the right steps today, and more likely if we take the wrong ones. The broader the right of abode we grant today, the stronger freedom will be after 1997 and the less likely the chance of Armageddon. The narrower the right of abode we grant today, the weaker freedom will be after 1997 and the more likely the chance of Armageddon after 1997 and the fear that the Government say they have at the top of their mind.

It is only late in the day that the Government have accepted the force of the argument from these Benches, and almost unanimously from Hong Kong, that it is the assurance of passports that will enable people to stay. I congratulate the Foreign Secretary, who has understood the force of that position and won a limited victory within the Cabinet. It is greatly to his credit that he pressed on with that.

[Mr. Ashdown]

Let me examine the logic of the Government's argument. They rightly say that giving 50,000 households the right of abode will persuade Hong Kongers to stay in Hong Kong. If that logic applies to the few, why does it not also apply to the many? If the 50,000 who get passports will stay, is that not more likely to be the case for the 315,000 households recommended by the Price Waterhouse study as the minimum required to ensure stability? If the argument applies to some British passport holders, why not to all who hold British passports?

The Bill shows that the Government know perfectly clearly what should be done, but do not have the courage of their convictions. The result is that the Bill is inadequate and apologetic. Against the scale of Britain's responsibilities, it looks puny and insufficient. It is concerned more with the troubled internal politics of the Conservative party than with our external obligations.

I warn the Government that there is a genuine risk that what they have done may turn out to be too little, too late. By pitching the numbers so low, they may well create the worst of all possible worlds by doing insufficient to secure stability, while creating a conduit for the emigration that they fear most. In their attempt to keep the numbers down, they have been forced to a system which is so selective that it must be divisive.

Mr. Foulkes: Yet the right hon. Gentleman will still vote for the Bill.

Mr. Ashdown: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, I shall happily give way to him. His position was cruelly exposed last night and this morning and he is not prepared to put it to the test again.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) rose——

Mr. Ashdown: At last, an intervention from the side Benches.

Mr. Wareing: The right hon. Gentleman has made much of the inadequacy of the Bill, and I agree that it is wholly inadequate. Does he agree that the 50,000 people of Hong Kong who will be admitted are possibly the most articulate members of the community? If, as he has been saying, he wants a much more liberal attitude, should we not encourage that articulate minority to speak for the overwhelming majority in Hong Kong? Is he aware that to go into the Division Lobby with the Tories is to go against his whole objective?

Mr. Ashdown: Obviously the hon. Gentleman has not been listening to the voices from Hong Kong, because they have been articulating precisely that case.

The Government must understand that their failure of nerve to do what is right and safe for Hong Kong runs a great risk. It is on the judgment of that risk that my party will ultimately base its attitude to the Bill.

To answer the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), a clear and welcome principle is embodied in the Bill—that Britain must grant the right of abode to its passport holders in Hong Kong. We shall support that principle by voting for the Second Reading tonight, but we shall seek to strengthen and improve the Bill in Committee.

Apart from the question of numbers, there are four areas where the Bill must be improved. First, it must be made less divisive. That can be done only by increasing the numbers. Secondly, we must address the needs of the non-Chinese ethnic minorities. Thirdly, the Bill must correct the injustice being done to non-British spouses of British expatriates. Lastly, there must be an amendment to the outrageous proposal in the Bill that no decision should be challengeable in any court or by anybody.

The Government would be wrong to assume that any Bill was necessarily better than no Bill. There comes a point when the numbers are so small and the provisions so divisive that they will create emigration rather than stem it, that they will undermine the credibility of the Hong Kong authorities rather than support them and that they will increase instability in Hong Kong rather than increase the stability of the colony.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashdown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I said that I would not give way to two interventions. In that way, I shall give him a better chance of speaking later.

We will bring that lesson home to the Government during the remaining stages of the Bill, and our judgment of the Bill's value will be based on the extent to which Ministers accept and acknowledge that truth.

One thing is certain: unlike the Labour party, we will not play domestic politics with the freedom and livelihood of more than 5 million people in Hong Kong. I am sure that I have had as many letters as the Leader of the Opposition, urging me to add to the Government's political troubles by voting against the Bill. They point to the leadership crisis in the Conservative party and argue that this could be the moment when Thatcherism is toppled. All that may be true, but my party, unlike the Labour party, will not hawk its conscience around according to short-term political electoral priorities.

Mr. Foulkes: Rubbish.

Mr. Ashdown: I give the hon. Gentleman yet another chance. I note that again he is not prepared to intervene. He is willing only to speak from a sedentary position.

Mr. Janman: May I return to the right hon. Gentleman's comments about the Standing Committee stage of the Bill? I understand from his comments his desire to see the Bill fully debated in Committee. Given the wide diversity of negative comments about the Bill, does he agree that the whole House would have a greater opportunity to do so if the Committee stage were taken on the Floor of the House rather than upstairs?

Mr. Ashdown: I must disappoint the hon. Gentleman. We shall not vote for that. He knows perfectly well that those who vote against the Bill will lose. They want the Committee stage to be taken on the Floor so that they can win by another means. I am not prepared to go along with that. Those who argue for that are deeply irresponsible.

Nor will we seek, like the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), to play one ethnic minority off against another. There was a day when the Labour party, once the great defender of the rights of those who are vulnerable at home and abroad, would have responded without equivocation to the call from the people of Hong Kong; but not today. Today, the Labour party, in a grubby search for votes, is prepared to turn a blind eye to the terrible damage that would be done, if the Bill were defeated, to confidence in Hong Kong and to Britain's reputation in the world.

There was a day when the Labour party opposed the British Nationality Act 1981, with the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook to the fore; but not today. Today, he has defended that same Act to the last letter. He has argued that the only protection which should be given to British passport holders in Hong Kong should be the pathetic provisions of that Act which he, ironically, also on 4 June, committed his party to repeal. Then, he said:

> "the necessity for repeal . . . is all the greater, not least because the Bill is largely based not on Government theories about nationality, but on Government fears about immigration."—[Official Report, 4 June 1981; Vol. 5, c. 1159.]

But today, it is the Labour party that is helping to fan those fears about immigration.

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's attitude to the Bill is best summed up in his own words as quoted in The Independent on 3 April:

> "When we have decided the manner in which we will oppose the Bill, I shall vote on a matter of principle."

There is worse still, however, for Labour does not stop at just opposing the Bill; the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has already said that it would not be committed to upholding its provisions were the Labour party to come to power. Thus, the Labour party adds irresponsibility to the abandonment of principle, as no statement is better calculated to increase instability in Hong Kong between now and 1997. What greater inducement could there be to emigrate from Hong Kong than the knowledge that all passport rights could be taken away by a future Labour Government?

What an irony that, in threatening to remove British passport rights, the Labour party is doing exactly what the Chinese Government have said they will do. Having joined the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) in voting against the Bill, the Labour party will then join the Chinese Government in seeking to nullify it. I wonder, has it any shame about the company it keeps?

The Labour party's only promise to the people of Hong Kong is that it will allow full democracy in the colony. Has it learnt nothing from the tragedy of the students of Tiananmen square? Democracy is not some kind of lucky charm that can be waved in front of a tank to stop it in its tracks; it needs to be supported and safeguarded. If democracy is to survive, it needs the most powerful safeguards. The most powerful safeguard for democracy after 1997 in Hong Kong lies in the freedom of its people to call in their passport rights as free citizens and go elsewhere. In denying them that freedom, Labour gives Hong Kong democracy with one hand and fatally wounds it with the other.

The retreat from empire was never going to be easy for this country. It created many difficulties and obstacles, but, for the large part, Britain has behaved honourably and responsibly. We have managed that retreat with dignity, and it is a record of which to be proud. I fear that we are in danger of besmirching that record tonight. The Government's weakness in front of Peking and the inadequacies of the Bill have done us and Hong Kong great harm.

I have no doubt that our forebears in this House would have responded to the challenges in a way that gave the House its great reputation as a defender of democracy. They would have understood the great issues involved. They would have guarded the importance of standing by a principle and accepted the need for leadership in persuading people of what should be done. They would have recognised Britain's long-term best interests.

I recall that, in the 1930s, when the Jews fled from Germany, we did not cavil that they did not have our passports, nor did we limit their numbers. We gave them sanctuary freely. Britain benefited and freedom was strengthened by that. Why is it that today we will not do the same for our own passport holders in Hong Kong?

Today, we rightly wring our hands over what we can do to assure freedom for Lithuanian citizens, bemoaning the fact that our scope for action is small. Why, then, do we turn our backs on those in Hong Kong who hold our passports and whom we have the power and the ability to help?

We shall vote for the principle of the Bill tonight, but will do so with little enthusiasm, and we shall seek to amend it in Committee. As it stands, it is the very least that Britain should do to honour its responsibilities. Its defeat tonight would amount to a betrayal of the best traditions of our nation, of Britain's long-term best interests in the far east and, above all, of the people of Hong Kong.

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford): I shall not follow the speech of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), especially as his peroration amounted to 50 per cent. of his speech. I was, however, slightly mystified by the right hon. Gentleman's conclusion. Earlier he seemed to say that, although he would vote with the Government on Second Reading, unless the Bill was amended to remove what he saw as its defects he held out the prospect of voting against the Bill on Third Reading.

The right hon. Member for Yeovil then proceeded to call the Bill a betrayal. If it still constitutes a betrayal in his terms after its Committee stage, surely that would cause him to want to vote against it on Third Reading. Would the right hon. Gentleman like to make his position clearer?

Mr. Ashdown: I am sorry to intervene so early in the right hon. Gentleman's speech, but he has asked me a question. I said that the defeat of the Bill tonight would amount to a betrayal—a betrayal which the right hon. Gentleman seems to be prepared not only to join, but lead.

Mr. Tebbit: I understood that, but would it constitute a betrayal if the Bill were defeated on Third Reading? If that is so, the right hon. Gentleman will not vote against it on Third Reading whether it is amended or not.

Mr. Ashdown: It would be a betrayal if it was defeated tonight.

Mr. Tebbit: Oh! It would amount to a betrayal tonight only, so when we come to Third Reading it will be "Not tonight Josephine.". I can see why the right hon. Gentleman said he was standing on principle, unlike the Labour party.

Mr. Adley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in view of what the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has just said, an hour in politics is a long time as far as the Liberal party is concerned?

Mr. Tebbit: My hon. Friend is right, and that is particularly true of a Liberal speech lasting an hour.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was asked on several occasions by the right hon. Member for Yeovil how many Hong Kong Chinese the Labour party would admit. I do not believe that the right hon. Member for Yeovil got a clear answer, but I can give him that answer in the words of the Labour party as written to a gentleman from Plymouth in a letter dated June 1987. One will appreciate that it has something to do with general election politics. The letter was from Mr. Bert Clough of the policy briefing unit of the Labour party on whose notepaper it was written. He thanked the gentleman from Plymouth for his letter concerning Hong Kong and said:

> "Neil Kinnock has asked me to reply on his behalf.
> Under our proposals British citizens in Hong Kong would become citizens of the British Dependent Territories. This would give them a meaningful citizenship with the right to enter, reside and work in Hong Kong but not the right to enter the UK."

The answer to the question posed by the right hon. Member for Yeovil about how many Hong Kong Chinese the Labour party would admit is simple—it is none. That was the Labour party's proposal at the time of the general election, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) has already observed, an hour in politics can be a long time and 18 months can be even longer. The Labour party is saying to one group of people that it would admit lots and lots of them, but to another that it would not admit any at all. In other words, it is traditional two-faced politics. I shall not go in for any humbug or evasion.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook should know more about the Bill that he is opposing. When one of my hon. Friends sought to intervene the right hon. Gentleman said that he would let him intervene if my hon. Friend could state the five criteria to be used for admission. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that there are seven criteria —[HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] I know where he has gone. He has gone to get a copy of the Bill to read it.

Although tonight there are clearly two groups of people —one, sadly, my right hon. Friends in the Government and one, the Labour party—who are intent on breaking their election commitment, I am intent on keeping mine. I welcome much of what my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said today. Certainly no one knows more about immigration than him, which raises a most interesting point. I think that my right hon. and learned Friend said that this was not an immigration Bill. If it is not, it would perhaps have been better if my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had taken charge of it rather than lumber the poor, unfortunate Home Secretary, who normally deals with immigration rather than foreign affairs matters. I think that I have my right hon. and learned Friend's support on that, at least, today.

My right hon. and learned Friend made a good speech, but it was not quite good enough. I do not believe that he had his heart in his own case at all times. I would not go all the way with the right hon. Member for Yeovil, but if 50,000 would offer a good measure of security, would not 60,000 offer 20 per cent. more, and would not 100,000 double the security? My right hon. and learned Friend says no, but I do not believe that he has confidence in the Bill.

I have one question for my right hon. and learned Friend which arises from his speech. He said that the Bill, if enacted, would do the work intended by section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act 1981. If that Act is not to be used, will it be repealed if the Bill is enacted?

Mr. Waddington: I must assure my right hon. Friend that I said nothing of the sort. I referred to the fact that it would replace the undertakings that we were prepared to give, and in some cases had already given, to those in sensitive occupations. At no time did I deal with section 4(5), which could not be used to fulfil the Bill's purpose because it deals only with the public sector and those who are servants of the Hong Kong Government.

Mr. Tebbit: I understand what my right hon. and learned Friend says, but, as I understand it, the Bill includes all those who would be included in section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act. So that section of the Act is no longer needed and could be repealed as it would perhaps be better as part of the Bill. We should not have two pieces of legislation covering exactly the same point.

Mr. Waddington: With respect to my right hon. Friend, section 4(5) does not deal just with Hong Kong.

Mr. Tebbit: Now we have the point—section 4(5) has a much broader application.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The Home Secretary's intervention appears to go back on what he said in response to the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). When the hon. Member for Orpington asked about section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act, the Home Secretary said that it was subsumed within the Bill. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman is forcing the Home Secretary to admit either that he misinformed the House when the hon. Member for Orpington questioned him or he is misinforming the House now.

Mr. Tebbit: The right hon. Gentleman is over-excited and a little slow to take the point. As I understand it, my right hon. and learned Friend said that the Bill subsumed it in relation only to Hong Kong obligations, and he wished section 4(5) to remain to use for purposes other than Hong Kong. I believe that that is correct, but if I have not put it correctly, no doubt my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will put it right later.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary also said that there was no point in taking steps that would come to a dead end in 1997—I think those were his words —in relation to an accelerated process of democracy which would be unacceptable to the Chinese authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend nods, and I think that that is right. As the Chinese Government have said that they will recognise the passports that would be issued under the Bill for the use of, for example, entry or exit from Hong Kong, is not the Bill also proposing a dead end? Many Conservative Members are concerned about that.

I agree with the Bill's aims, which are to stabilise the position in Hong Kong and ensure its continuing prosperity so that it will be an asset to China in 1997.

I agreed with much of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said about the need for the future of Hong Kong to be secured through the relationship between Great Britain and China. That is the only conceivable way in which it can be assured. I shared everyone's emotions on seeing the film of the massacre in Tiananmen square, but in the real world we must assess what can be done in the future as well as express our regrets about what has happened in the past. It is pretty certain that more people have died in civil disturbances in Russia under Mr. Gorbachev than died in Tiananmen square. Perhaps Mr. Gorbachev has a better public relations agency than Peking.

I agree that we must avoid, not encourage, further large-scale immigration into the United Kingdom. Above all, I welcome the fact that the Bill offers the protection of the right of abode here to those who would be most at risk, on political grounds, after 1997. My difference with the Government is that I believe that the Bill will fail on three counts out of four. There is no difference between any of us about the need to offer the security of a home here to those Hong Kong Chinese who served the Crown, police or judiciary, or might otherwise be at risk, if the mood of China was difficult after the takeover in 1977. [HON. MEMBERS: "How many?"] I understand that there will probably be about 5,000 or so, but it is a matter not of numbers, but of principle. We should stand on principle. I am standing on the principle on which I have stood for many years. Those people would not be those who, when they come from Vietnam, are known in Hong Kong as economic migrants, but true seekers of political asylum.

I am also concerned about the fate of Asians of Indian descent who are likely to become stateless and possibly refugees. They are clearly not Chinese or British, but Indians. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will intervene most strongly on their behalf with the Government of India to ensure that India undertakes its obligation towards its peoples who have been residing in Hong Kong.

I said that the Bill would fail in its major purpose, and I shall explain why. It is clear that the Chinese Government regard the Bill as incompatible with the spirit, if not the letter, of the accord. They have no use for the concept of dual loyalties and expect the people of Hong Kong to be Chinese and loyal to China. Clearly, the swearing of allegiance to the Queen and taking up of British nationality are either cynical charades performed for personal gain or require true allegiance to the United Kingdom, not China. In addition, as I understand it, China does not appreciate the almost fruitless efforts of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, to persuade other countries to denude Hong Kong of its key people before 1997.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary may not recollect that a man cannot have two masters, but the Chinese certainly do. Therefore, after 1997, they will discriminate against the holders of British passports. What is more, the Hong Kong Chinese know that, too, and for them the British passport is not an inducement to stay beyond 1997, but a ticket to a new life elsewhere, either here, on the continent or wherever. What is more, the sooner the passports are issued, the sooner the 50,000 heads of families—by definition, the key people needed to be kept in Hong Kong—will leave.

What then? Will we be asked to provide for another 50,000, at least to keep the second eleven in position in Hong Kong? We all sympathise very much with the wish of Hong Kong Chinese to remain, if they had their choice, under the British flag in Hong Kong rather than under communist rule, but that option is not open to them. Their future as Chinese is in China, if Hong Kong is to have a future.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary made much of our debt of honour to the people of Hong Kong. I accept that debt in respect of those who might be at risk after 1997 because they have served the Crown, but have we a debt of honour to those who have served themselves? Are they not economic migrants no different from the Vietnamese whom Hong Kong is unwilling to accept? What about the debt of honour to the British people? Are not pledges made, not once but four or five times, also matters of honour? As far as I know, none of the people of Hong Kong was enticed there by agents of the Crown, or offered passports to go there; nor was there any doubt that, come 1997, it was certain that all but a tiny part of the colony would revert to China, and there was a clear expectation that the colony would do so, too.

Before I turn to immigration policy and my objections to the Bill on that ground, I want to make two other points about its drafting—first, on clause 1(5). That was the clause to which the right hon. Members for Yeovil and for Sparkbrook took such exception. It is an effort to judge-proof the Bill. If it is believed that this clause would actually stick in British law, it is a great pity that it was not put into some of our local government legislation.

Secondly, I welcome the fact that for the first time an immigration measure has been drafted to admit only those likely to be of discernible benefit to our economy as opposed to a liability to our taxpayers. That concept deserves rather wider application, but I am amazed by the extent to which the issue of United Kingdom passports should be delegated to persons not under any direct control of this House, who cannot be called to account in the House under any circumstances.

I turn now to immigration policy. For good reason, the Conservative election manifesto of February 1974 said this:

> "We have provided the country with the necessary means for preventing any further large scale permanent immigration and also with important new powers for preventing illegal immigrants . . . the number of new immigrants admitted in 1973 was the lowest since control was first introduced by the previous Conservative Government more than a decade ago . . . We intend that this decline shall continue".

A year later, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister became leader of the Conservative party, and in September 1976 an elector in Northamptonshire wrote to her about immigration and received a letter from her private office from which I shall quote the relevant sentence:

> "The last Conservative Government brought in the Immigration Act which from January 1973 stopped nearly all permanent immigration—with two clear exceptions (namely dependants and certain United Kingdom passport holders) . . . We believe that the numbers coming in must be restricted to the absolute minimum consistent with these undertakings".

In 1979, my right hon. Friend won the general election, campaigning then, as she has done since, for the strictest possible controls. In 1987, the pledge was repeated in full knowledge of the implication of the Hong Kong accord, in the following words in the party's manifesto. They are familiar to me more than to others in the House as I had something to do with the manifesto:

> "Immigration for settlement is now at its lowest level since control of Commonwealth immigration first began in 1962 . . . we will tighten the existing law to ensure that control over settlement becomes even more effective".

Those pledges were made because these islands of ours are already overcrowded and they were made in the belief that great waves of immigration by people who do not share our culture, language or rules of social conduct and who, in many cases, owe no allegiance to our country, were and are destabilising factors in society.

During the Salman Rushdie affair, some who have lived here for years under the protection of the Crown and holding British passports clearly showed their contempt for our society and our laws. It became clear to many people that a dual system was operating in this country under which people who had been clearly seen inciting others to murder were not brought to book. I shall not rehearse all those arguments; I merely state that if we are not to see social upheaval arising from religious, cultural and ethnic differences, we have more than enough to do to integrate existing communities into British society without adding to that burden or exacerbating existing problems.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook referred to one of my views: how can I explain to my constituents of Indian, Pakistani or Singhalese origin that we have no room here for their families to join them but we have room for 250,000 Chinese?

Mr. Waddington: No Conservative Member has said that there is no room for the families of those who are settled here. The immigration rules give them the right to bring in their families and I pointed out in my speech how great a proportion of total immigration into this country such people constitute.

Mr. Tebbit: My right hon. and learned Friend says that there is room for them, but not just yet. If he believed that there was room, he would increase the resources available to process their applications, but I know that that is not being done——

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tebbit: No, if my hon. Friend will forgive me.

I will not take any stick from Opposition Members over the processing of applications, because the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was critical of the fact that almost 20 years after the Ugandan Asians came here there were some people who, although they appeared to have been entitled to come here, were still kicking around the world without visas—[Interruption.] I remind the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who has just spoken from a sedentary position, that there was a Labour Government in the intervening period. What happened to the vouchers then? Why were they not honoured by the Labour Home Secretary when he was in power? The Opposition have no right to enter the debate with words of that kind.

Mr. Cormack: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tebbit: I would rather not.

We all know what our constituents feel about this Bill. According to my secretary, I have received more than 10,000 letters on this issue——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What, all from Chingford?

Mr. Tebbit: —so I have some idea of how other hon. Members' constituents feel, too. I have received 10,000 letters from all over the country, including, I suspect, some from Opposition Members' constituents.

A recent poll in The Independent on Sunday showed opinion to be split about 65 per cent. to 25 per cent. against the Government's proposals. Only 11 per cent. of the electors say that the Government should admit more Hong Kong Chinese, and by 84 per cent. to 13 per cent. the people of Britain say that there should be tighter restrictions on immigration. I might add that a rather higher percentage of Liberal Democrat supporters believe that than do supporters of the Labour party, which must be a great comfort to the right hon. Member for Yeovil.

I end by addressing a few remarks to some of my right hon. and hon. Friends. The poll that I mentioned also showed that no fewer than 59 per cent. of the electorate declared themselves "don't knows" when asked which of the parties had the best policy on immigration. They are confused and bitterly disappointed by the Government's policy U-turn——

Mr. Cormack: And my right hon. Friend is responsible for that.

Mr. Tebbit: —which they say, by 13 per cent. to 1 per cent., will make them less rather than more inclined to vote Conservative.

My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) must recognise that since I made my views known in public immediately after the issue arose in the House of Commons I have given no television interviews or written any articles about it. The issue will be decided here tonight, not out there in the country. [Interruption.] I have sought to show what the state of opinion is out there and I believe that we should listen to that opinion, but I did not seek to cause that opinion to be made. It was there.

Mr. Cormack: My right hon. Friend knows full well that he has been portrayed throughout the country as the leader of this so-called revolt tonight. He knows jolly well that there has been no U-turn by the Government. As a former chairman of the Conservative party, he knows that manifestos cannot be cast in stone and that circumstances sometimes oblige Governments to change. He has done a grave disservice to the party which in the past he has served so well.

Mr. Tebbit: I did not want my hon. Friend to establish in the minds of many more people the enormous influence which he seems to think that I have. If he believes that I have created this wave of opinion in a matter of a few weeks, he must think that I am one of the most powerful politicians in Britain, and certainly that I have a much better rapport with public opinion than he has. I cannot imagine that he would ever be able to move public opinion to the extent that he has ascribed to me.

I agree with my hon. Friend. There are occasions when Governments have to say that, for good reason, they cannot deliver what was in their manifesto. But this is not a good reason. All the circumstances were envisaged when the manifesto was written and we should remain firm on it.

That is perhaps even more relevant. I had not expected to have the pleasure of hearing my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), but my mind went back to November 1972 when he introduced legislation to provide for state control of prices and incomes. It was a deeply unpopular Bill. It broke a clear and specific election pledge and it flew in the face of Conservative beliefs. My right hon. Friend believed that that Bill was in the interests of the country at that time.

In their hearts, a clear majority of Conservative Back-Benchers knew that the Bill was wrong. We should have defeated it on Second Reading, but the Government were unpopular and the Whips argued that the Prime Minister's authority and position would be seriously damaged if there was a revolt against the Bill. The Labour party, which has always hankered after such controls, did, of course, vote against the Bill. I was one of those who was persuaded, against his judgment, to vote for it. In February 1974, the Government were trapped by a miners' dispute which they could not settle without breaking their own prices and incomes laws.

So I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends whether they will make the mistake that I made in 1972. What would the Conservative party Whips be saying if this had been a Labour Government's proposal? Would we be supporting it in breach of our election commitments? If we would have voted against a Labour Hong Kong Bill, why should we vote for it just because it is brought forward by a Conservative Government? [Interruption.] A voice says, "What about the poll tax?" That was in the Conservative party manifesto and I have voted for it at every turn.

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against the Government tonight with a heavy heart. In 20 years in the House I have never yet voted against my party Whips.

Mr Cormack: Really?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes, really. My hon. Friend has a more vigorous record in voting against the Government than I have.

Tonight I have had to choose between the Government and the Whips on the one hand and my party and its clear commitment to the voters who elected them to office on the other. That is why I will oppose the Bill tonight and stand by my commitment to the electors which I made in 1987.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), I should make plain that I have not selected for debate the amendment in his name and the names of his hon. Friends because it is beyond the scope of the Bill. He may draw attention to it in his speech without speaking to it.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Whenever the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) seeks to persuade us that he is standing on principle, I—and, I suspect, some of the troops whom he is seeking to lead into the Lobby against the Government tonight—rush for cover.

I represent a constituency a third of whose inhabitants are of Asian origin. One of my endearing memories of the right hon. Gentleman as chairman of the Conservative party is the regular visits that he made to my city and other cities like it seeking to persuade black and Asian British citizens that the Conservative party was anxious to secure their electoral support and in government was doing everything possible to sustain and nurture the prosperity of black and Asian communities in Britain.

The right hon. Gentleman's speech tonight was in sharp contradiction to the statements that he made as chairman of the Conservative party on these matters and to the statements that he has made in recent weeks and months as we approached the debate on the Bill.

I thought that I heard gasps around the Chamber when the right hon. Gentleman sought to persuade us that he was not the leader of the campaign within the Conservative party against the Bill. Could I have been wrong? An avalanche of propaganda has been generated by the right hon. Gentleman seeking to persuade the British public that an army of Conservative Members of Parliament were anxious to follow him into the Lobby tonight to vote against the Bill.

Mr. Tebbit: First, I find nothing inconsistent between what I have said as chairman of the Conservative party, Secretary of State or in any other office that I have held, and what I have said this evening. As I said this evening, I believe strongly in the integration of immigrant communities into our country. That is the only way forward. New waves of immigration will hold back that process and that is one of the principal reasons why I am against new waves of immigration.

Secondly, with regard to generating waves of publicity, I should tell the hon. Gentleman that I have one employee only, a secretary, and that if she and I between us could have generated all the publicity, my goodness me, we should take over Conservative central office and do its work more cheaply than it is doing it at the moment.

Mr. Madden: I thought that the right hon. Gentleman did take over Conservative central office on one occasion, and I do not want to speculate on why he no longer holds that office.

But the campaign that I still believe the right hon. Gentleman has been orchestrating during recent weeks and months has fundamentally changed in character during that period. Initially, he sought to oppose the Bill on straight immigration grounds. Subsequently, he sought to argue that he was against the Bill because it would upset all those people in Hong Kong who would not be eligible for British passports.

The right hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Nor can he conceal the fact that large numbers of people will shortly be eligible to come into Britain. We hear very little from the right hon. Gentleman or his acolytes about the 300 million EEC nationals who, after 1992, will be able to enter Britain and seek employment without a work permit. They will be able to establish businesses without any evidence of funds. They will also be able to bring their spouses, children aged up to 21, parents and grandparents.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): In this case I do not agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) about the fundamentals of the Bill. Does the hon. Gentleman agree, however, that there is a big difference between the European Community's reciprocal rights of residence, work and abode and the right of immigration into a country?

Mr. Madden: What I will say is that most of these people will be white. That is why we do not hear very much from the right hon. Member for Chingford or his supporters about the 500,000 citizens of Macau who have been given a right of abode by the Portuguese Government, and who can also enter the United Kingdom after 1992 under the same rules. We do not hear anything from the right hon. Gentleman or his supporters about the 1 million British citizens in South Africa who could also come into this country without difficulty in the near future, or about the 8 million to 9 million British citizens in the old

[Mr. Madden]

Commonwealth who have the right of abode and could enter. Between 300 million and 400 million people could flood into the United Kingdom in the foreseeable future, but we hear nothing about that from Conservative Members, especially the supporters of the right hon. Member for Chingford.

I must declare an interest: I was invited to Hong Kong last week by the Hong Kong Government. It was a valuable opportunity for me to have discussions with a large number of individuals and organisations between the publication of the Bill and this debate. Hon. Members from both sides of the House were also present, and I am sure that we all found the visit helpful.

It was clear to us that the vast majority of people in Hong Kong regard the Bill, and the scheme to allow just 50,000 heads of household to have British citizenship and the right of abode here, as a complete and utter irrelevance.

The vast majority of Hong Kong people do not want to leave Hong Kong, which they regard as their home. Many do not want to come here because they cannot afford to leave; the option of emigration is not theirs because they have not the money to exercise it. However, large numbers —1,000 a week—are now leaving, and that exodus is a potential threat to the viability of the Hong Kong economy. We need to consider what action needs to be taken now to stem it, and that is what the Bill is all about.

We hear much about democracy and the lack of it. If there is any blame for the absence of democracy in Hong Kong, I suggest that the accusing finger should be pointed at successive Governments of both political persuasions, spanning more than a century. For 150 years, Britain has administered Hong Kong—some say paternalistically; many would say in a most authoritarian way. If any criticism is to be made about the absence of democracy and the lack of enthusiasm for it among the Hong Kong people, surely the blame lies squarely with those Governments, but I question whether such an absence of democracy is a modern reality in China.

On our visit, we were shown photographs of the 1 million people in Hong Kong who came out on the streets before the Tiananmen square massacre to show their solidarity with the people of China—their relatives, their friends and their own people. They came out on to the streets to demonstrate their solidarity with the movement towards democracy, and stood in silent empathy and solidarity with the Chinese people. The massacre of 4 June had an enormous impact on the Hong Kong people. For months afterwards, they wore black armbands to show their solidarity, and their disgust with the actions of the Chinese Government. Even now, armies of Chinese police, agents and others are scouring the campuses of China to try to identify those who were active in the democracy movement, especially its leaders.

Every day 75 refugees go legally from China into Hong Kong; more than 100 seek to enter it illegally, and many who are detected are sent back. I plead with the House to understand that democracy is an extremely fragile entity in Hong Kong, and I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) that we must do more to ensure that it progresses.

When my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) replies to the debate, I should like to hear what the next Labour Government would do to ensure that there is one person, one vote—full democracy—in Hong Kong before 1997, when the Chinese take over. If our claims to support the extension of democracy are to be credible, or to command support in Hong Kong and in Britain, we must spell out clearly whether we would take unilateral action to ensure that that full democracy was introduced in Hong Kong before 1997. We must have firm and clear assurances about the methods by which we would seek to do that. Few of the people to whom I spoke in Hong Kong last week, from the governor down, gave any hint or made any suggestion that the Chinese Government are any more amenable now to progress towards full democracy in Hong Kong than they have been in recent years since the negotiations took place.

We all recognise that there are major defects in the Bill. In my view—and in that of other hon. Members who would have wished to support the amendment—the figure in the Bill should be removed: such matters should be dealt with on the principle of fairness and justice. However, once we enter the numbers game, we are inevitably in the business of arbitrary and highly subjective criteria, which in this case are totally secret. There will inevitably be divisiveness if people do not know the basis on which the selection is made.

A fundamental reform must include the right of appeal for those people who are refused British citizenship and the right of abode here. Surely basic justice demands such a right of appeal. One of the long-standing grievances of the British Nationality Act 1981 is that people are given no explanation of why their application has been refused, and they have no right of appeal against that refusal.

We must remove the nonsense of the 500 top business men who will be invited by the governor to apply: that is wholly unacceptable, and should be deleted. We should also snuff out the proposal—still lingering on—that would effectively enable British companies to nominate people to become British citizens. That is wholly unacceptable and undemocratic. I hope that the Minister will make it clear that that scheme is dead and buried, and will not be revived.

We need to protect and safeguard political activists who have been in the vanguard of building democracy in Hong Kong and who are totally excluded from the scheme. We also need to ensure that there are genuine provisions for public service and local government workers. At the moment, there are no provisions whatever for social workers, who are leaving Hong Kong in large numbers and who are vital for the future of Hong Kong. Of course we need to ensure that those who are entitled to a British passport are not cash-limited by that arbitrary figure of 50,000.

Many in Hong Kong obviously consider British passports as an insurance policy; however, people are leaving Hong Kong for various reasons. There are those who are leaving to improve their economic prospects. Others are leaving because they are desperately worried about the safety of their families. Others are leaving, particularly for Canada, Australia, America and Singapore, to secure an overseas passport, and they have to live in those countries for two or three years to get the necessary residential qualifications.

The brightest and the best in Hong Kong do not want to come to Britain. Many of those who want to emigrate are not seeking to come to Britain. They do not see their future here, but they want an insurance policy. I hope that we shall make proper safeguards for the non-Chinese ethnic minorities. I am totally dissatisfied with the assurances given so far by the Home Secretary. I should like to see much better safeguards for the non-British spouses of British citizens in Hong Kong.

I urge the House to understand that it is not just a matter of insurance policies. The most important aspect of giving British citizenship to the largest possible number of people in Hong Kong is to place an effective sanction and to put effective pressure on the Chinese Government so that they know that, if they treat Hong Kong badly and unfairly after 1997, a significant number of Hong Kong British citizens will be able to vote with their feet and leave Hong Kong safely and in an orderly fashion.

That is what the Bill is all about. It is a totally inadequate and defective measure. It represents a shoddy and shabby compromise of a debt of honour to a country from which we have derived enormous economic benefits over 150 years to people who thought they were British citizens and who look to Britain as their home and to Parliament as their House of Commons and their democratic defence. It is a shoddy and inadequate Bill.

I shall abstain tonight and I shall seek with others to improve the Bill in the ways that I have suggested. I urge those who seek to demolish the Bill for motives which many of them do not have the guts to articulate publicly to think very carefully indeed. Not only are they playing with the lives of many in Hong Kong: they are playing with the destiny of that country and the relationship of Britain with mainland China.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) that that is an important matter. If we seek further to appease China, the plight of the people of Hong Kong, with or without democracy, will be extremely difficult up to and after 1997. Let us agree that the Bill is of modest help. Let us seek to improve it and, above all, let us remember that the best interests of the men, women and children of Hong Kong lie in offering British citizenship and the right of abode. The vast majority do not wish to exercise that option, but they need our reassurance and commitment. The Bill goes a little way towards offering that commitment and protection.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Speeches between now and 9 o'clock are limited to 10 minutes.

7.4 pm

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) made some good points, but I disagree with the view that a faster pace towards democracy is the answer to the problem which the Bill seeks to address. Indeed, if a faster pace towards democracy were to lead to confrontation with Peking, confidence in Hong Kong would be weakened rather than strengthened.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has left the Chamber. His speech set a new record for prevarication and obfuscation. So far as I could make any sense of what he said about granting passports or the right of abode to Hong Kong Chinese, it appeared that fewer passports would be granted but there would be more rights of abode granted to people from the Caribbean and south Asia. There is an important distinction between those groups. The people from Hong Kong would not want to come here whereas the others would come here at once.

The House knows of my lifelong interest in Hong Kong. For the past 20 years I have had no financial interests there, but I have a deep political interest in doing what we can to perpetuate the amazing success that Hong Kong has achieved. The rejection of the Bill would be damaging to Hong Kong and the United Kingdom. The Hong Kong brain drain would certainly accelerate and there would be a decline in the economy. Other countries such as Canada and Australia are not worried about inviting people from Hong Kong who are of great merit or importance to Hong Kong to emigrate to those countries.

Nor should we be worried about the fact that those to whom passports will be granted are the people who are most important to Hong Kong. If the Bill were rejected, more raids would be made by other countries on the skilled people of Hong Kong. Recently, a United States medical centre wrote to all 74 radiographers in Hong Kong inviting them to join that organisation and offering them help in obtaining United States passports. Qantas sent recruiters to Hong Kong to lure away several hundred mechanics from the Hong Kong Aircraft Engineering company. Fortunately, those efforts met with little success, but such attempts would be accelerated if the Bill were rejected. Other countries would increase their quotas for immigration from Hong Kong in the misguided view that that would help.

The Bill is a credit to Her Majesty's Government, especially the new concept that selected people from Hong Kong would be able to get United Kingdom passports without having to spend several years working here first, thus damaging Hong Kong's prospects.

The rejection of the Bill would also be damaging to the United Kingdom. It would certainly damage our reputation for fulfilling our obligations. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will attach importance to that. It would damage our economy. Our visible and invisible exports to Hong Kong represent more than £2 billion a year. If the Hong Kong economy is damaged, those exports will suffer. The total net assets of companies in Hong Kong controlled from the United Kingdom are £6 billion. The gross stock market value of British-owned, controlled or managed companies in Hong Kong is £19 billion and those companies would suffer. If sufficient damage is done to the economy of Hong Kong, that will reduce the value of Hong Kong to China, and the economic value of Hong Kong to China is its most important safeguard.

I believe that the Chinese intend to observe the joint declaration and agreement of 1984, but I profoundly believe that a bit of Chinese self-interest is a better guarantee still. As long as Hong Kong continues to carry one third of China's foreign trade, and to account for one third of China's foreign exchange earnings and for two thirds of the value of foreign investment in China, that is a good safeguard that China will observe the joint declaration.

By damaging confidence and the economy in Hong Kong, rejection of the Bill would increase the possibility that we might see what the governor described as the "Armageddon" scenario. There might be a flood of refugees from Hong Kong whom we would be obliged to do our best to take, and we might be obliged to take more than those for whom the Bill provides passports.

[Sir Peter Blaker]

I have received representations from several British companies with business interests in Hong Kong. I shall read a letter from Geoffrey Maddrell, chief executive of the Tootal Group, which I received in November before the Government announced the policy encapsulated in the Bill. He explains the links that his company has with China through Hong Kong. He says:

> "The total turnover of companies"— that is in the Tootal Group—

> "dependent on supplies out of China is around £75 million this year"—

1989—

> "and earns approximately 10 per cent. in pre-tax profit. The continued success of our investment and interest in China depends very largely on our key managers in Hong Kong", who are working in China supervising Tootal's joint ventures. He continues:

> "However, in the current uncertainty surrounding British Government Policy all the senior managers are preparing to emigrate to obtain citizenship of Canada and Australia. They are taking this course of action as an insurance for the future, not because they wish to leave Hong Kong. In consequence, should they be offered right of abode in the UK, it is not their intention to exercise that right."

He says later in his letter, and I repeat that it was written before the announcement of the Government's policy:

> "Tootal would seek rights of protection for some 25 managers and their families by issuing them with a full British Passport with right of abode in the UK."

I spoke two days ago to Mr. Maddrell to discover his reaction to the Government's policy. He said that his managers are waiting to see whether the Bill is passed. If it is rejected, they will accelerate their attempts to move to Canada or Australia.

Mr. Tebbit rose——

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds) rose——

Sir Peter Blaker: I am afraid that I do not have time to give way.

That letter shows two things: first, that the few passports that will be given to key people in Hong Kong will make a tremendous difference; and, secondly—this is the key point—that we are talking not about people who are keen to leave Hong Kong but about people who want to stay there.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I agree with the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) that all of us may face far heavier obligations and much more difficult problems in 1997 than we face today. We may have to take on far greater obligations to meet a disaster at that time than we are faced with at present.

Nobody can contribute realistically to the debate who is not prepared at least to identify the problem and to seek to remedy it. The problem will be between now and 1997. We are all agreed that there has been a massive loss of confidence in Hong Kong since the events of Tiananmen square. There is a heavy outflow of people who have the skills and responsibilities essential to the successful running of the colony over the next seven years and to its prosperity.

That is the problem. How will we—"prevent" is too strong a word—mitigate or slow the outflow of people from Hong Kong who are necessary to it? I believe that my right hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who I understand will wind up the debate, have somewhat misled themselves in their arguments. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook said that his solution to the problem is to introduce democracy in Hong Kong. I am very much in favour of that and it is not impossible for Britain to do so—after all, we remain masters of the colony until 1997—but China has issued the Basic Law and everyone in Hong Kong knows that. However far democracy has advanced in Hong Kong, if the Chinese wish to roll it back they have the power to do so. Therefore, unless there is a great change in China, we cannot offer additional confidence to the people of Hong Kong by telling them that a Labour Government will introduce democracy in Hong Kong. It is no way out to say that we shall introduce democracy and restore confidence in Hong Kong between now and 1997. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook has misled himself on that point.

My right hon. Friend also misled himself on another major point—his assessment of the reaction of other ethnic communities in the United Kingdom to the passing of the Bill. I represent a large ethnic community and I can assure him that no such anxieties have been expressed by my constituents. I am certain that the grievances that my right hon. Friend properly expressed on behalf of the immigrant communities will be dealt with when a Labour Government take office. As my right hon. Friends and I expect that there will be a Labour Government within the next two years, putting right the grievances of the ethnic minorities should not be used as an excuse for denying people in Hong Kong the possibility and prospect of coming to the United Kingdom. My right hon. Friend has misled himself on two quite major matters.

I shall deal briefly with the criticisms that have been made of the Bill. It has been said that the scheme is selective, which is so, but is anyone, except the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), realistically arguing for a general, all-embracing and non-selective United Kingdom scheme? With the exception of the right hon. Member for Yeovil, I have heard no one arguing for that. Critics say that we need different categories for selective admission in addition to those already in the Bill. To some extent, that is so, and I wholly share the views of those who have expressed the unsatisfactory position of the non-ethnic Chinese in China and the need for far stronger guarantees for their future, otherwise they will be citizenless after 1997.

I was glad to hear what the Home Secretary had to say about war widows and other widows, but there are other categories, including students, for whom the Select Committee recommended we should make special provision in assisting them to obtain nationality. I should like to see those categories included.

The categories are no substitute for a scheme to help to stem the exodus of key personnel from Hong Kong. War widows do not help in manning difficult positions in the Hong Kong police force, civil service or business, nor necessarily do ethnic minorities who are unfranchised or denied citizenship. Students certainly cannot assist in that respect. We must return to the main point and say that we must have a scheme to help to stem the exodus of key personnel from Hong Kong.

It has also been said that the proposal is elitist, not merely selective. In a sense, it is because the people concerned are key personnel. However, the House should bear it in mind that the main categories cited in the Bill and in the supporting papers are very similar to those in the work permit scheme, which we have operated under successive Governments for the past 20 years. I shall read out the list in the latest 1980 edition of the work permit scheme. Whom do we allow in other than relatives—who are a separate matter? We allow in > "(a) those holding recognised professional qualifications;

> (b) administrative and executive staff;
> (c) highly qualified technicians having specialised experience;
> (d) other key workers with a high or scarce qualification in an industry or occupation requiring specific expert knowledge or skills;"

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Shore: I am sorry. I cannot give way because of the time factor.

I do not accept that the scheme can be described as elitist because of the perfectly sensible and open categories that are established. The scheme includes—and we must be clear on the range of people—judges, civil servants, Customs and Excise officials, the fire service, the immigration department, the Independent Commission Against Corruption, the Royal Hong Kong Police, the military garrison, engineers, architects, air traffic controllers, editors, doctors, chemists, midwives, nurses, physiotherapists, teachers and education administrators. Those categories add up to no fewer than 24,000 of the 50,000 promised passports. Many of the remaining 26,000 passports will have to go to managers and executives, but the balance may be wrong and overloaded in favour of those categories. That is a matter to be debated later.

The scheme has a number of obvious defects and some have been well expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). The lack of review procedure and clause 1(5) are intolerable, as is the lack of help for people who may be in political danger in Hong Kong because of their expression of opposition to the Chinese Government. Such help must be included. There can be no guarantee that the Bill will succeed, but no serious alternative has been proposed. It is essential that the people of Hong Kong should not be given the impression that we have washed our hands of their problems. That would have a disastrous effect on the people there and on the international community, whose help we may need far more in 1997 if the Chinese tear up the joint declaration. For those reasons, I shall not vote against Second Reading and I hope that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends will join me.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I had prepared some remarks today that sought to expose the rather hollow and internally contradictory nature of the speech by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) on the basis of what he had said before about the Labour Government's contradictory position on the issue. However, it has turned out to be unnecessary for me to make a speech on those lines because the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) has just made it for me most persuasively. I hope that Opposition Members have listened carefully to what he said. His speech was most persuasive and could be taken as an argument in support of the Bill, although he has said that he intends to abstain.

As we debate the Bill today, people are leaving Hong Kong at the rate of about 1,000 a day and it is important to bear that background in mind. Many are the most able and entrepreneurial people whom the colony badly needs to keep it going as a thriving community. It is, therefore, not a day too soon for the House to be asked to approve the Bill, which has my strong support. It is clear that the Bill's prime purpose is to staunch the outflow of people from Hong Kong and to encourage what the Americans call the "movers and shakers" to remain in the colony until 1997 and, we hope, well beyond that. The Bill will help to do that and it is a necessary confidence-building measure.

The upper limit of 50,000, which is on the face of the Bill, is fewer than many in the Hong Kong community would have liked and it is certainly fewer than they argued for originally. However, it is equally far fewer than the number who might have to come here in a future crisis if the policy goes wrong. On the other hand, the figure is many more than some of my right hon. and hon. Friends seem prepared to accept, for the reasons set out so cogently by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit). Ministers may be tempted to feel that they have got it about right as they find themselves between the Scylla and Charybdis of the two positions. I believe that it is the least that we should be offering in the circumstances to the people of Hong Kong and I shall explain why briefly.

First, the Bill is an insurance policy, as many other hon. Members have said, which should give many of the key people the confidence to remain in Hong Kong. That is the cardinal point. Whether it will succeed in that venture is a matter of judgment and cannot be proved at this stage. Secondly, it is only if Britain takes the lead in this way and at least in part fulfils one of its last colonial responsibilities that we shall be able to look to other nations to play a fuller part in any rescue operation that may be needed in the event of the Peking regime reneging on its solemn commitment of 1984. I strongly hope that does not happen, but when one enters the realm of insurance policies, one must guard against all risks and one has to think of the chances of the Government persuading their partner nations such as the United States and those in the Commonwealth and elsewhere to pull their weight in the event of that coming about.

Thirdly, the Bill is wholly consistent with the terms of our agreement with the Chinese, which never precluded our right to grant full British citizenship to people in Hong Kong. Fourthly, it can always be argued that any immigration arrangements run the risk of causing bitterness and resentment for some, especially those who cannot fulfil their wishes or who fall just the wrong side of some official dividing line. The point was made by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney and it is not an adequate argument against having the criteria for selection that are envisaged in the Bill. As the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney said, all such measures from time immemorial have involved a degree of selection and the House must face that reality.

Fifthly, even if as many as 250,000 people, as distinct from passport holders, come from Hong Kong to Britain in the future, I am convinced—and I know that a number of my constituents are convinced—that they would prove to be a great asset to this country. The key point is that as long as the policy works—and I have already said that there can be no certainty that it will work 100 per cent. —these people will remain an asset in Hong Kong and will be to our own considerable economic and trading benefit, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) said.

On the other hand, if the policy were not to work as intended and if all those who were entitled to do so came to this country, they would be a great asset to us in due course. All the evidence from the Hong Kong people who are already established in this country—and I remind the House that there are many of them—suggests that would be so. Similar evidence of Asian people who have settled on the Pacific coast of the United States and in Canada corroborates that conclusion. One has only to ask people who know of those circumstances. Asians have solid family lives, they believe in the value of education and getting on, and they tend to be self-sufficient high achievers. In short, they are exactly the sort of people—and I emphasise this to my right hon. and hon. Friends who may have doubts about the Bill—whom we should welcome if they ever felt the need to come to this country.

The opposition to the Bill is rather shabby. It is disingenuous in the case of the Labour party and distasteful in the case of some of my right hon. and hon. Friends. The Bill is a sensible and timely response to an important problem which is principally the responsibility of this country and this Government. The Bill has my strong support.

7.29 pm

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Honour is not a common component of political conduct, and in matters to do with nationality and immigration, British Governments over the years have behaved with craven dishonour. This mother of Parliaments—this exemplar of parliamentary democracy—has, over the post-colonial years, evaded and abandoned its responsibilities. It has dishonourably created a series of lesser, second-class nationalities. The French and Portuguese, with the same sort of history, have behaved with much greater rectitude and responsibility.

Now we have come to these convoluted arrangements over Hong Kong. We have a direct responsibility for the people of Hong Kong until 1997, and of the two major parties neither the Government nor the Opposition are facing up honourably to those responsibilities. I grudgingly admit that it is perhaps the Liberal Democrats who are being truest to those responsibilities.

The only just solution would be—and must be—the restoration of full British citizenship to all British nationals in Hong Kong. Then, of course, the scream would go up, helped by some of the more disreputable characters in the House, "You are letting in $3\frac{1}{4}$ million Chinese." What a load of rubbish. Of course nothing of the sort would happen. And who in their senses would want to come to Thatcher's Britain, with its inequality, its collapsing public services, its general tattiness—[HON. MEMBERS: "Us."] You fellows cannot get away; you are stuck here. [HON. MEMBERS: "What are you doing about it?"] I am trying to improve matters; I usually seek to try to improve the state of Britain.

There is little evidence that many of the $3\frac{1}{4}$ million Hong Kong Chinese who hold British passports without right of abode would want to settle in Britain anyway. An opinion poll taken in the colony early last year showed that, of the 38 per cent. who would emigrate given the chance, only 6 per cent. would choose to come to Britain, so the nonsense about $3\frac{1}{4}$ million Chinese coming to Britain is easily dismissed. Incidentally, what a shot in the arm an influx of Hong Kongers would give to the tired, underperforming economy of this damaged country.

The Bill and the proposed scheme are profoundly unsatisfactory. Their purpose is supposedly to restore confidence in the colony and staunch the flow of emigrants, which reached 50,000 this year. But the arbitrary and limited figure of 50,000 households is a one-off arrangement that does not ensure Britain's continuing commitment to Hong Kongers. In effect, the Government are saying to most of Hong Kong's many millions, "We are concerned only about those of you who are close to us—those of you who work with us, who are successful and whose future we choose to ensure. Come 1997," the message is, "the rest of you can go hang."

That is not a proposition that I am prepared to support. The chosen few will have been nominated within a year or so. Where is the flexibility in the scheme to allow us to deal with changing events in the years up to 1997? Perhaps the Labour party should consider that there is a possibility that a Labour Cabinet and a Labour party conference may have to cope with the unfolding crises in those years.

The scheme should be flexible, and open to review as events develop in China and in Hong Kong, to ensure the healthy functioning of that territory. Anyone whose application for registration under the scheme is turned down will be given no reason for the refusal and will have no possibility of appeal. Absolute discretion is vested in the Home Secretary, and with a Home Secretary of the calibre of the present incumbent—whose premise when he had responsibility for immigration matters was that if immigration control was not hurting, it was not working—that is not a heartening prospect.

The scheme's most damaging flaw is its disregard for the non-Chinese ethnic minorities who have no nationality other than British and who will become stateless after 1997. In all justice, special consideration should have been given to that category in a loading of points. Better still, those people should be given special dispensation to gain full and proper British citizenship. I trust that the Labour party will do that if we come to government.

The Opposition's amendment to commit the Bill to a Committee of the whole House I shall, of course, support. But what would we do in government? I was not reassured by the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). The Chinese have passed the Basic Law, and we should be foolish, if we came to government, to try to reopen that issue.

We shall not be able to increase the number of elected Members in the process of democratisation that we have promised in the Government of Hong Kong before 1997. The Chinese will not budge from the figure of 20 elected Members of the Legislative Council. I hope that we shall be wise enough not to try to stir up difficulties and further damage confidence in the last two or three years of our responsibility by attempting to increase that figure to 40 or 60. The urgent need is to try to maintain confidence and economic performance in Hong Kong now.

So how must I vote? I had hoped that the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) would be here. He has pretended some interest in this matter and taken on himself the leadership of the faction in the Tory party that fans every skinhead eruption of racism. His mail bag which he quoted proves that. For years, his only distinguishing feature has been his viciousness. A character such as he could only have flourished under a Thatcher Administration, with their mean-mindedness, and their lack of concern and conscience. He will vote against the Bill. For all the Bill's inadequacies and selectivity, I shall support the Government tonight, if only personally to cancel out the vote of that disagreeable and non-admirable right hon. Member for Chingford.

Mr. Paul Channon (Southend, West): As usual, the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) has gone over the top. His remarks about my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) were ludicrous, as the House well understands. One may or may not disagree with my right hon. Friend, but he represents a point of view that he is wholly entitled to express.

On the other hand, at least the hon. Member for Warley, East made his position clear. We know where he stands, just as we know where the Liberal Democrats stand, and although I disagree with him, I believe that he has done the House a service in that respect. We must ask the Labour party what it would do. Our debate tonight is being watched not only here but in Hong Kong, and the people of Hong Kong are entitled to know what a Labour Government would do. It is wholly unreasonable for the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) to take refuge in a whole collection of clichés and weasel words designed to obscure, rather than saying clearly to the people of Hong Kong what the Labour party would do if it won a general election and came to power.

The hon. Member for Warley, East was entirely right about democracy. Of course we should all like to see more democracy in Hong Kong, and that is conceivable; it is possible that, as the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) said, we could get a little more democracy, but in view of the Basic Law recently passed in Peking, that seems improbable even if it is worth trying. It is no good building a policy on the flimsy, implausible and improbable assumptions outlined in the speech of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who is not here at present but who will wind up the debate, also has a lot to answer for. Whatever he may or may not have said in Hong Kong, his remarks have been widely misunderstood. I hope that he will speak clearly to the House so that people in Hong Kong, who may have misunderstood his remarks, may know what will happen if the Bill is passed and a Labour Government come to power.

In view of the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), I should at once declare an interest by saying that, like the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), I have been to Hong Kong recently. That was well worth doing, because I think that I now have some impression of what the state of opinion in Hong Kong is.

The House must answer two questions. Will the package that the Government propose lead—as many of my hon. Friends believe it will—to large-scale immigration into Britain? The question whether it would matter if it did is a different question altogether. Secondly, will the package actually work in Hong Kong?

In many ways, the package is unfair and flawed, but any package would be unfair and flawed. I do not kow how anyone could devise a package which was not unfair and flawed. I agree with many of the criticisms of the Bill. I agree in particular with the criticisms of clause 1(5) and the fact that there is is no appeal against an arbitrary decision which may mean the difference between a happy and successful life and a life that could be very unhappy indeed.

Many small groups will be unfairly treated. I was grateful for the comments by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I would be extremeley grateful if he would consider the position of non-United Kingdom spouses of British citizens. For example, as I understand it, if a British husband was to die in Hong Kong now, his wife would have no right to come to this country. That would be invidious when we consider what would happen in the case of a Hong Kong citizen who is given a passport and whose wife would have automatic right of entry. Many other questions must also be answered later.

I believe that the package might work for a while, but I do not have any great confidence in its long-term future. The only important factor that will settle the future of Hong Kong is the attitude of the Chinese Government to what happens in Hong Kong. We do not really know what that attitude is or what it will be after Tiananmen square. Do the Chinese Government still believe that Hong Kong is so valuable to them that it is worth preserving, or do they see it as a hotbed of people trying to intrigue for democracy against the wishes of the Chinese People's Government? That is the great difficulty.

If the Chinese position improves, people will stay in Hong Kong. If not, they will go—if not now, then later. I fear that, in many cases, our policy towards Hong Kong is waiting for something to turn up. Perhaps it will and perhaps it will not. We do not know whether the Chinese Government will change before 1997 and, if they do change, whether they will be any better. Some people believe that the Chinese Government will be better, but that is a flimsy basis for policy.

The package is designed to make people stay. I believe that people will stay for a few years. Some may stay until 1997 and see what happens. Others will not take that risk; who can blame them, when the Chinese Government make statements like those that they have made recently?

There is a risk that the package will work for just a short time and that the House will have to return to the issue before 1997. We delude ourselves if we believe that the Bill will be the last word. What we should do about the situation goodness only knows, but I believe that the issue will not go away.

There is some evidence that people will stay for the time being at least. Singapore has offered many places. People are not leaving Hong Kong for Singapore, but they have the security that Singapore provides. I believe that it matters if people leave Hong Kong. A dramatic outflow of skilled people that will weaken the Hong Kong economy is in no one's interests.

Even from narrow British self-interest, that is true, because Hong Kong receives billions of pounds of United Kingdom investment. If we include invisible investments, I suspect that British investment is greater than that of America or Japan. However, the Hong Kong Government have historically always played down our investment, I believe quite wrongly.

I do not believe that people from Hong Kong will come here to stay. The hon. Member for Warley, East referred to a recent poll that showed that of those Hong Kong citizens who wanted to leave, 4 per cent. wanted to come to Britain, as opposed to 37 per cent. who wanted to go to Canada. I believe that people from Hong Kong may well use us as a staging post.

We must ask the Government tonight to tell us more about what other countries are doing in that respect. I agree that we have a British responsibility. However, the issue may become a great international problem. Apart from Singapore and France, which will take a handful, and a few other countries that will take a handful, what countries will help in what might become a serious problem?

The package is flawed, and it can give hon. Members no pleasure. All political parties are in a false position, and we can derive no pleasure from having to debate the Bill today. However, having thought about the issue with much care, I believe that it is worth buying the breathing space that I believe the package will bring. I do not believe that it will lead to large-scale permanent immigration to the United Kingdom, and I believe that those fears have been greatly exaggerated.

The Bill will need amending in Committee or on Report. It is full of holes and that is inevitable in a package of this kind. However, on balance I believe that the House would be wise to accept the Bill. If it does not, the disillusionment in Hong Kong and the skills outflow in the early stages could lead to a situation which might be more serious than it is now in Hong Kong, and one which the House and the people of Hong Kong will come to regret.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): The right hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) is right. The future of Hong Kong will be decided, whether we like it or not, in Peking. How we handle China over the next seven crucial years will be of the utmost importance.

I believe that the Foreign Secretary was right to pursue democratisation as far as he did and to accept at this stage that there was no further give in the Chinese position. I do not believe that that necessarily excludes a rather larger number for direct elections in 1995. We should pursue the argument for further democracy.

The Foreign Secretary was right to refuse to accept Chinese statements criticising the granting of passports to a select group of people in Hong Kong. Anyone who has had any passing involvement in Hong Kong, let alone anyone who has held office as Foreign Secretary, knows how delicate is the governance of Hong Kong. That is a quite exceptional colonial responsibility in which confidence is everything. Confidence can disappear literally in a matter of hours.

In the negotiations for the agreement, I think at the ninth meeting, the failure to reach an agreed statement between the British and Chinese negotiators, and their refusal to accept the word "constructive", caused a run on the Hong Kong dollar and a serious lack of confidence. The situation is that fragile. If the House was to vote against the Bill tonight, there is no doubt that the run on the dollar overnight—as we now have 24-hour exchanges—would be devastating. Therefore, we must watch everything that we say and do.

I am glad that the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) has returned to the Chamber. From time to time I have some affection for the right hon. Gentleman. But, to put it bluntly, his actions over the past few months have had a devastating effect in Hong Kong. If he seeks the highest office in this country—to be Prime Minister—and he cannot understand the damage that he has caused over the past few months, his chances of ever holding that office have been considerably damaged.

The chances of our carrying through the next seven years to a successful transition to China are uncertain and no one can be sure whether we will succeed. However, we must do all in our power to achieve that end. As we are losing key personnel from Hong Kong daily, we must be selective. We must try to help those people who contribute so crucially to the success of Hong Kong as it is at the moment.

If we manage to staunch the flow of those key people, the prosperity for the millions of people in Hong Kong will be enhanced. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) must consider my argument. If we can get it right for the few, we will get it right for the many. However, we will not succeed unless our actions carry conviction in Peking.

That is why I believe that the Prime Minister was absolutely right to talk to and have dinner with the Chinese ambassador. He understands the delicacy of the question and it is important to keep a dialogue going with the Chinese at all costs even when we disagree with them. The Chinese do not mind people who disagree with them. They would prefer open and honest dealing and in the past they have kept all their treaties. There is still a chance of a highly successful transition despite the horror of Tiananmen square.

The events in Tiananmen square proved the right hon. Member for Chingford wrong. It is no good quoting manifestos from 1979, 1983 and 1987. Those have been completely blown apart by what happened in Tiananmen square. No one likes waves of immigration. I am sure that no Conservative Member under their Government liked accepting the 28,000 Ugandan Asians. We all lived through the traumas of the Kenyan Asians in 1968 and the question of restricting Commonwealth immigration in the early 1960s.

It is a delicate and difficult issue. Many hon. Members would like to be more generous about immigration than we know would be acceptable in the country. That is the reality with which we have been grappling in these delicate years.

For us not to respond to a traumatic event such as occurred in Tiananmen square would be dishonourable. That is the argument against those manifestos. Let us assume that those statements were given in good faith. Nevertheless, the statement about "swamping" before the 1979 general election is one reason why the official Labour party is not abstaining tonight, but is voting against the Bill. That statement has caused deep and continuing resentment.

However, we must put such resentments behind us because we are dealing with the position in Hong Kong now. I share much of the criticism that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook deployed against current immigration policy. There is no doubt that there should be more generosity towards the relatives of immigrants who have already been accepted into full citizenship of this country. It is a scandal that we are not more generous, but that is no reason for voting against the legislation. Although it is a fair debating point, it is no reason to cause problems in Hong Kong.

At this stage, we need to bolster the confidence of the key people in Hong Kong because if they stay, in a year or two years' time, there will be the chance of achieving a better atmosphere in Peking. Just as Tiananmen square was traumatic for us and for Hong Kong, we must accept that it was also traumatic in Peking. The atmosphere there is delicate. However, I believe that we shall find a more responsive attitude in two or three years' time and that the Chinese Government will accept as a fait accompli the decision that we have taken on passports. There is a chance that we shall see greater democratisation, but in the meantime the next few months are crucial.

If we are to gain support from the international community, Britain has to show the lead. It is no use asking other countries to give extra passports to the Hong Kong citizens who work in their national firms. They will not be generous if they see the House of Commons rejecting this Bill. If that is the case, we can forget all about expecting generosity from others. If we are to urge other countries to be more involved and if we are to pave the way for possible greater international response if something went wrong, we must show that we are ready to take our burden and our share.

It is in that spirit that the Social Democratic party will vote for the legislation. We shall vote against the Bill's Committee stage being taken on the Floor of the House because we believe that that is purely and simply a delaying tactic. What is more, we shall vote for the Bill on Third Reading.

7.52 pm

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has focused the attention of the House on the central issue of this debate—the stability and the future stability of Hong Kong. The issue of this debate is not which Hong Kong citizens have the best claim to live in the United Kingdom; it is how we exercise and discharge our responsibility for the future stability and prosperity of Hong Kong. We are faced with a serious exodus of skilled people from Hong Kong which threatens its stability. I do not know whether our responsibility to do something about that is moral, historic or practical, but we clearly have a responsibility. It is set out in paragraph 4 of the joint declaration, which states that we have a "responsibility to maintain the continuing prosperity and stability" of Hong Kong until the middle of 1997.

Apart from the fact that we have that responsibility, we must remember that we have extensive commercial interests in Hong Kong, not only before 1997 but—we hope—afterwards which it is in our interests to protect. China has similar extensive commercial interests. The fact that China has not exercised its practical power to take back Hong Kong in the past 40 years can be related to those extensive commercial interests, and China, too, has obligations. It has the same obligations under the joint declaration.

In such debates, we often lose sight of the fact that the purpose of China's policy is not only to get Hong Kong and Macau back into the Chinese fold—its main target is Taiwan. In the not-too-distant future, China wants to be able to do a similar deal with Taiwan and to bring it back into a greater China. To do so, China must be able to show the people of Taiwan the successful arrangements that it has made to work in Hong Kong. Therefore, it is in China's interests to honour its agreements and to ensure that it inherits and maintains a prosperous and stable Hong Kong.

If we accept that we have an obligation to do something to maintain Hong Kong's stability, the question is, what should we do? I do not believe that it is practical to consider admitting to the United Kingdom either the 3·3 million United Kingdom passport holders or the 5·7 million people who live in Hong Kong. To put it in practical terms, it would amount to 8,000 people per constituency, although those people would not be distributed averagely across the country. That is not a practical proposition and to hold it out as such is irresponsible.

However, we must do something. We cannot simply wash our hands of this and say that we are not prepared to grant any passports. We cannot simply let history take its course. We must do something and that necessarily involves a compromise. I do not know whether the right number is 40,000 or 60,000, but 50,000 seems reasonable. If the worst came to the worst, that would not be an impossible number of people to admit to the United Kingdom. On the whole, they would tend to be extremely useful people. The number is probably sufficient to give the boost to Hong Kong that we want to give.

If we accept that we are to grant a number of passports under 5·7 million, there must be an allocation system which will necessarily be unsatisfactory. If we focus our attention on our purpose of stabilising what is happening in Hong Kong, we must grant those passports to the people whose continued presence in Hong Kong is likely to help to enhance that stability. If we do so, we shall discharge our responsibility in a way that is ultimately seen not as divisive, but as positive. It would give such people an insurance policy.

To those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who say that that insurance policy will not work, I simply say that it is what thousands of Hong Kong citizens have been seeking and acquiring for themselves over the past 10 or 20 years. They have been going to Canada, Australia and the United States, fulfilling their residency requirements, acquiring foreign passports and returning to Hong Kong. We are simply offering to make that facility—that insurance policy—available to them without the need to leave Hong Kong for two or three years.

The opposition to the Government's proposal has fallen into three categories. The Social and Liberal Democrats have taken the principled but thoroughly impractical position that everybody should be admitted. The Labour party has not only been impractical, but thoroughly unprincipled. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has got his party into a box of all or none. The right hon. Member for Birmingham Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), was not very successful in trying to wriggle out of that box today. The right hon. Member for Gorton has consistently opposed every proposal and whenever the Government have brought this proposal to the House for discussion, he has disparaged and denigrated it, but he has never offered an alternative. He must know that if there were a Labour Government—I am sure that this is recognised by many Opposition Members—they would have to do something similar to what the Government propose. The right hon.

[Mr. John Maples]

Member for Gorton has sunk to a new low—even for him—in his cynical and opportunistic exploitation of these events for party political advantage, dangerously regardless of the international consequences. If we ever needed further evidence of how totally unfit he is to be a British Foreign Secretary, we have had it in his contributions to this problem.

The more interesting opposition has come from my right hon. and hon. Friends. They circulated a letter to all my right hon. and hon. Friends in which they set out their concerns about the Government's proposal. Basically, they said that they were worried about the future of Hong Kong, but they must realise that the people of Hong Kong want this proposal. They do not regard it as too much—if anything, they regard it as far too little. It is not for us to second-guess what is in their best interests. If they want the provisions, it is not for us to say that they are not good for them.

The second point made by my right hon. and hon. Friends is that China will deny its citizenship to United Kingdom passport holders. Although that is what China is saying, I think that it is extremely unlikely that it will do that. The people to whom we will have granted passports will, in the main, be exactly the people whom the People's Republic of China wants and needs to remain in Hong Kong after 1997. Even if that is not the case, those in Hong Kong who have acquired British passports will have a choice between Chinese and British nationality. Even if they chose to retain their British nationality, under the terms of the joint declaration they would continue to have the right to reside in Hong Kong. Again, we should leave that choice to them. It is not for us to make such a choice on their behalf.

The third and perhaps the most serious reservation of my right hon. and hon. Friends is that China will see the provisions as a deliberate attempt to undermine the joint declaration and the stability of Hong Kong. That might be what China is saying, but I cannot believe that that is how China genuinely sees it. Both China and the United Kingdom have an obligation under the joint declaration.

Clearly we are trying to enhance stability, not to undermine it. It is so much in our interests and in the interests of China to maintain stability that I cannot believe that the Chinese will interpret the Bill as undermining the joint declaration. The Chinese have such enormous, overriding interests in the future prosperity of Hong Kong that I do not believe they will see the Bill as undermining our obligations to the future of Hong Kong.

My right hon. and hon. Friends were a little disingenuous in their letter. Their real anxiety—which is a legitimate one—was that the Bill might be seen as a breach of United Kingdom immigration policy. But they must face the fact that this is a unique situation. It is not an immigration problem but a unique colonial inheritance which cannot be solved by granting independence. The problem has been exacerbated in the past year by events in Tiananmen square. We cannot ignore that. People in the United Kingdom will see Hong Kong as a unique case for which we have some responsibility. If that involves one-off granting of British passports to people in Hong Kong, they will accept it as the price that we must pay for that obligation.

My hon. Friends are wrong not only about the reaction of people in the United Kingdom but about that of the Chinese Government. I ask both Conservative and Opposition Members who may be thinking seriously of voting against the Bill to reflect on the consequences outside if the Bill is rejected. In Hong Kong it will be seen as a betrayal and there will be a far greater and accelerated exodus of skilled and valuable people from Hong Kong in the immediate future. That will undermine stability to an extent that we have not yet even contemplated. There will be serious consequences not only for our future commercial interests in the far east but the intervening period of British administration of Hong Kong will be made extremely difficult, if not impossible.

Rejection of the Bill tonight will be seen in China as a sign of immense weakness. It will weaken our negotiating position with the People's Republic of China in a devastating way. It will feel that it has the measure of us. In the world at large rejection of the Bill will be seen as Britain failing to honour its clear obligations.

8.1 pm

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): On the issue of Hong Kong, we face a problem because of past conduct, attitudes and judgments and neither the Tory nor Labour Front Benches have anything to be proud of. That was demonstrated in the debate this afternoon. If one reads the debates in the House from 1984 until just before Tiananmen square, what strikes an objective person—I can claim to be objective because I was not present—is the combination of naivety and stupidity on the part of both Front Benches. A self-satisfaction ran through all the debates about how well the negotiations with the People's Republic of China were handled and how everything in the garden of Hong Kong and China would be lovely. We are now paying the price for that lack of judgment.

There has also been a failure of nerve on the part of both Front Benches, on the moral issues. I was remarkably surprised to hear the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), argue earlier that morality and international politics did not run hand in hand. I concede that a great deal of practice in human history might demonstrate that, but the essence of the argument for democracy is built on morality. It is morality that says that individually we grant other people, every man and woman, the right to be wrong, as we see it. That is a moral judgment that has been built up into democratic societies in western Europe and other places.

I listened carefully to the arguments about the need for more democracy in Hong Kong. I argued for that many a long year ago, before I came to the House in 1970 and during the 1970s. We have left it a bit late. Democracy is not just about one man, one vote, but about building up democratic institutions capable of taking the stresses and strains of political debates. It is the creation of political classes, if one likes to put it that way, which can deal with each other in a civilised way and contain all the passions within a society without allowing them to overspill into violence. I am afraid that we have left Hong Kong too few years to build up democratic institutions. The Government's proposals will not fulfil our responsibilities to create democracy there.

There is another point of shame for the Labour Front Bench, particularly the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). I was utterly appalled to hear him engage in divide and rule tactics between immigrant communities. I never thought that I would hear that from him. He asked why people from the Indian subcontinent should find themselves in difficulty because people from Hong Kong had been allowed in. His premise was not sound. Dependants and others from the Indian subcontinent who are waiting to come to Britain and people in Hong Kong have one thing in common. They both have a relationship with this state because of the colonial past of the United Kingdom. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman did not recognise that.

I wish to put on record in the time available to me the joint Scottish National party-Plaid Cymru position. The House of Commons has a responsibility for the status of the Hong Kong Chinese. The House has the power to exercise that responsibility. We know to what type of regime we are prepared to hand over those people. When I was in Hong Kong earlier this year—I have no interest to declare because I paid my own way—I read in one of the newspapers a statement by the person who is supposed to be the head of the Supreme Court in the People's Republic of China. He said that the word of the Communist party was above the law. If I were in Hong Kong without a passport and a means of escape, I should be extremely nervous.

For generations the House has brayed about morality. I remember the first time that I went to Hong Kong as a young service man, when there was a great outpouring of refugees from mainland China into Hong Kong. I read in the newspapers and was told in current affairs sessions held in our Army unit that we were there to defend democracy, freedom and the free world. Morality mattered very much in those days. There has been a great deal of preaching about morality but the present package offered by the Government and what the Labour party offers demonstrate that moral words have not been met by moral deeds.

Our position is exactly the same as that of the Liberal Democrats. We believe that all people in Hong Kong with a claim to British citizenship should be granted British passports and the right of abode. The SNP and Plaid Cymru also deplore the racist basis of the denial of passports to 3·25 million of the 3·28 million Hong Kong Chinese.

In other debates I have heard hon. Members argue that we cannot give millions of people a passport and an open-ended commitment to allow them to come to Britain at some time in the future. We have been told that it is impracticable. But what about the 1 million people in South Africa who have passports and the right to come here at some indeterminate point in the future, or the 8 million or 9 million people in north America and the old Commonwealth countries of Australia and New Zealand? They have the right to come here at any time in the future, yet no one seems to be terribly worried about that. Of course, they have white skins and that is what makes the difference. If Chinese people in Hong Kong were regarded, to use the racist term, as "our kith and kin" we should have a different Bill before us and different speeches would have been made from both the Front and Back Benches. I regard the Hong Kong Chinese as intellectual, political and human kith and kin as much as any white South African with a passport.

The Bill is not the best one that could be brought before the House. It does not match the need for justice, as several other hon. Members have said. It has been cobbled together as an expedient to meet a crisis.

We shall support the Bill because it does two things in principle, although perhaps inadvertently. First, it is an open acknowledgement of our collective ability to meet our collective responsibility in the House of Commons. Secondly, it breaches the Government's previous argument that we cannot give passports to people in Hong Kong and expect them to stay there. That was the argument, yet it is precisely the opposite argument that the Government are putting now.

No one knows what the position will be on mainland China between 1990 and 1997. If China again demonstrates a willingness to kill people and suppress democratic movements, we have in the Bill markers on which later we can state the case for everyone who is entitled to receive a passport and the right of abode.

Given the political difficulties of the Conservative Government, it is tempting to use the Bill further to upset the Government, but the SNP and Plaid Cymru will not lend ourselves to that. The Bill deals with human beings and they are far more important than tactics in the United Kingdom's internal politics. We should like to offer a rescue and insurance package to all the 3·28 million Hong Kong Chinese, but it is not in our power to do so. Tonight we have an opportunity to do that for 225,000 of them and we shall vote to do so.

8.11 pm

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars). I do not agree with him. It is a question of the right to be wrong. Either he is or I am. It was also a pleasure to listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples).

I was in the East Indies fleet when Hong Kong was reoccupied in 1945, so my memories of the area go back a long way. I wish to deal with two sides of the issue: first, the effects on China and Hong Kong and, secondly, the effect on the United Kingdom if the Bill is enacted.

Hong Kong is part of China. In 1984, we signed a treaty for its return, as we had neither the naval, military nor economic strength, nor the wish, to retain it. Its future lies entirely with China. I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) that our relationship with China is vital to its future. The 1984 treaty changed the whole position. The future of Hong Kong now depends solely on Peking. Whether it survives or dies depends on the relationships of Hong Kong and the United Kingdom with China. That important point must always be remembered.

I am a layman and we in the House are generalists. Indeed, our strength is that we are generalists and representatives of the people. I believe that we have irritated China on two issues. It is interesting that Taiwan is not offering to take people from Hong Kong. People in Taiwan to whom I have spoken believe that China's stand on passports and democracy in Hong Kong is right, and the Taiwanese better than the British Foreign Office should know the Peking Government's attitude.

We were in Hong Kong for a long time, yet we did little for democracy. It was ruled as a colony and the governor had the power. Suddenly we are in a hurry. It may not be a legal breach of the 1944 treaty, but if I were Chinese I would consider it an odd moral breach that we should expedite democracy when in a few years time Hong Kong is to return to China. I know that it is a question of one country, two systems, but whether it is capitalism against socialism or also democracy against some form of totalitarianism has never been properly worked out.

The Bill will enable us to give 50,000 passports to 250,000 people who will then come under a foreign power, Britain. Knowing the historical attitude of China to people from the west, that is the silliest step that we have ever taken. I do not put it more strongly than that. It has irritated the Chinese. They do not believe in dual nationality. As far as I know, the Foreign Office would not employ people of dual nationality. I may be wrong, but we have positive vetting in sensitive areas. Those people with British passports would probably be in charge of sensitive areas, so it is inevitable that they will be dismissed at the beginning in 1997 for being servants of a foreign power.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Hear, hear.

Sir Rhodes Boyson: It is nice to have the agreement of my hon. Friend. I feel more certain in my views now, having carried at least one hon. Friend with me.

The whole question of the 50,000 passports is suspect.

We must work with Peking; otherwise, there will be no future for the people of Hong Kong—not just the 250,000 whom we have selected—the bureaucrats and those who have made money—but for anybody. What belief can the Chinese Government have in the pledges of a British Government who have reneged on their pledge to the people who elected them that there will be no more large-scale immigration? Only rarely do I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, but he rightly argued that we must look into the Chinese mind and see what we can do there. If one breaches a pledge to one's own people, how can anyone believe that one will keep a pledge to other people?

There was no consultation on the Bill, not even with the Conservative party. We on the Back Benches were landed with it. There was no democracy about it. There was about as much democracy as there is in Hong Kong. I do not say that unpleasantly, but I put it on the record to cheer everybody up. We wonder what will happen next.

Hon. Members have referred to the immigrant community in the United Kingdom. Obviously, the Bill affects them. At some time, people will say that we have enough immigrants. We may agree that there should be 100,000 or whatever, but at some stage there must be a bar. Everybody, and certainly the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), has dodged the question of numbers.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Sir Rhodes Boyson: I must not give way. I have only five minutes and today I shall finish in time. Last time, I was cut off even before my peroration. Not that I need one, but I intend to make one this evening.

I have probably more constituents from immigrant stock than any other Conservative Member. I am continually trying to get in relatives of people who live here and who should be here. My priority is to look after my people first. They are here. One case of a couple will show how bad it is. The grandfather of the wife was a brigadier in the imperial British Army. Her father was a group captain in the Indian air force and provided great defence contracts to this country. The father of the husband was an inspector in the imperial police when we ruled India and won 40 commendations for gallantry. His only child is here.

The couple have two children, one of whom needs constant attention, for which they pay. They want the wife's parents to come to this country. They can live on their pension. It will cost the United Kingdom nothing. They will not breed at that age, unless there is a great miracle. Nobody can have any objections. For 18 months, I have been trying to help those people to immigrate, but I still cannot get them in. There is no way that I can defend the Bill when I have to deal with such matters in my constituency. That has to do with the Bill, and those of us involved in such cases know that it does.

My Chinese community do not want the Bill. They tell me that they came here because they wanted to, not because they were running away.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Yes. It was a positive decision.

Sir Rhodes Boyson: Again, I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her agreement. I am undoubtedly carrying the House with me this evening.

What happened elsewhere at the end of the British empire? We often handed peoples over to one-party dictatorships. Did we provide passports then? Some funny things have happened in some of those countries. Did we help? Thank goodness we helped the Ugandan Asians, and in Kenya, but in some of the others, no help was given. The provision of passports has been highly selective.

At the beginning, I would take in all those who have served in Her Majesty's forces and their widows. I would start from there. I would say no more than that at present. I am sorry to say this with the Foreign Secretary present —we served together in Northern Ireland—but it is a matter of personal integrity and I must say that Foreign Office policy on China has been wrong and has irritated China. It should be changed to working with China, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said. He will not thank me for continually quoting him. He may think that he is in bad company, but I will do so again. He said that we must get on with the Chinese. We must get it right.

If the Bill is enacted, it will further damage our relationship with China. My sympathies lie with China on this matter. It will do nothing for my people who want their families united now. I do not want to hear promises of other people coming here and worrying about where they will end up. Sad as it may be, I shall have to vote against the Bill's Second Reading.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): Tonight, we have witnessed a number of attempts at sophisticated racism, especially in the speeches of Conservative Members. It is a measure of Opposition Members' hostility to the Bill that those Conservatives have been forced to try to hide their racism in sophistry. One such attempt was made by the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), who talked about the Hong Kong Chinese queue-jumping. It is disgraceful that someone who was directly responsible for keeping black and minority ethnic people from joining their families in this country should now cry crocodile tears about those people having to wait while the Hong Kong Chinese queue-jump. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) also referred to this matter.

Hong Kong Chinese are already in the queue to get into this country because they have been caught up by the racist immigration legislation now in force. It is absolutely wrong to argue that black and ethnic minority people whose relatives or friends are waiting in queues in Karachi, Jamaica or wherever object to Hong Kong Chinese coming here. The people to whom I have spoken understand the circumstances now facing the Hong Kong Chinese.

It is important to understand how this Bill has come about. Partly it is a result of the Commonwealth Immigrants Act 1962, followed by the British Nationality Act 1981 which changed the status of Hong Kong citizens, who then became citizens of the British dependent territories. The citizens of a number of other colonies, for example Gibraltar, the Falklands and Montserrat, also had their status changed. Since that time the British Government have given full citizenship rights of entry and abode to the people of Gibraltar and the Falklands, but those rights have been denied to the citizens of Hong Kong purely on the basis of colour, although the Government will try to argue the numbers game.

The best thing I can do is to quote from the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants whose 1985 report states:

> "The barrier to acceptance of a residual moral responsibility for people who have lived under British rule, and whose future has been negotiated over their heads is the same barrier which has for twenty years obstructed justice and morality in British nationality and immigration law: the fear of non-white immigration to Britain. It is not merely a question of numbers, but of colour. Millions of other people from overseas have an absolute right to enter Britain: between three and nine million Commonwealth citizens, from Australia, Canada and New Zealand; over 200 million nationals of EC countries; about a million white South Africans. Almost all the people concerned are white; their right to enter Britain is unquestioned and does not lead to any public fears of being 'swamped' by immigrants."

The Bill demonstrates what it is all about.

I contrast the behaviour of the British Government with the way in which Portugal has acknowledged its responsibilities to its territory of Macau, which is also due to be handed back to China in 1999. The people of that territory have been granted full Portuguese citizenship rights, including the right to live and work in Britain after 1992. Unlike Britain, Portugal has recognised its responsibilities towards its colony.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) tried to make out that Britain has no moral responsibility for the citizens of Hong Kong. I was a citizen of a previous British colony and I can tell the House what a colony is all about—possibly I am unique in the House in that respect. If one lives in a British colony, one must learn English and follow British traditions. Britain tries to mollycoddle such colonies and tries to engender a parent-child relationship with them. Because of that, and because it has exploited it economically, Britain has a clear moral responsibility to Hong Kong. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said that Britain has given a lot of money to Hong Kong, but I assure the House that it has taken a lot more out.

As a colonising power, Britain took on the responsibility for protecting the citizens of Hong Kong. It has a responsibility for their internal and external security and that is why there is a governor of Hong Kong. It is an absolute disgrace that Britain can just relinquish such responsibilities on a whim. The British attitude appears to be, "We do not mind what happens to the rest; we shall take just a few."

Britain is further culpable because of its failure to honour its commitment to ensure at least a measure of democracy in Hong Kong before 1997. In Macau, the people can vote in the Portuguese presidential elections and for two seats in the Portuguese assembly. Britain has no such arrangements.

A number of my colleagues and I have discussed the draft Basic Law and people have expressed their concern about human rights. We were teasing such things out until 4 June and the tragic events in Tiananmen square. Those events caused panic among the people of Hong Kong and they turned to Britain, the mother country—the protector of those people—for support. What they got from the Government was this Bill saying that, with a bit of luck, a quarter of a million people can come here if they pass the test.

It is important to consider the test that the Government have set. The points system is a disgrace. If one is aged between 30 and 50 and one passes the other criteria, one is allowed to come to Britain. However, if one is under 30 or over 50 one does not receive the 50 points necessary. Therefore, people over 50 will automatically leave Hong Kong by other ways. I do not understand how the Government can say that the Bill is intended to keep people in Hong Kong.

Fifty points are awarded under the proposed points system if one is proficient in English. If the Bill is designed to keep people in Hong Kong, surely one should get points for proficiency in Chinese.

Hong Kong needs to establish the ability to govern itself. The position in Hong Kong demands that the Bill of Rights which the former Foreign Secretary promised to the people of that territory be enacted soon. Secondly, there should be rapid progress towards democratic Government, directly elected by the people of Hong Kong. Thirdly, all British passport holders in Hong Kong should have restored to them full rights of citizenship, including the right of entry and abode in the United Kingdom. The British Government should accept their responsibility for all the people who are legally and lawfully resident in Hong Kong.

I intend to abstain from voting on the Bill. I agree with my Front-Bench spokesmen that the Bill is elitist and that the method of selection is bad. I must, however, support the principle of allowing people to come to this country. I am not prepared to go into the same Lobby, however, as the right hon. Member for Chingford on this or any other issue to do with race. For those reasons I shall abstain in the main vote and support my hon. Friends' motion that the Bill should be discussed in a Committee of the whole House.

8.30 pm

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): I speak on this subject with some trepidation, because I know of the expertise of many of my right hon. and hon. Friends. From the tone of today's debate, it would seem that there is general acceptance of our duty to do all in our power to ensure the stability of Hong Kong during its last years as a British colony and the lead-up to its time as a special administrative region of China in 1997. When I say "in our power", the House will recognise that this is limited, not least because China has essentially held all the cards in the lead-up to the Sino-British joint declaration of 1984 and thereafter. However, our influence is still considerable and the measures before us today reflect that.

When the Government announced the quota system for British passports for Hong Kong citizens, I was extremely sceptical of its merits. Well intentioned though it may have seemed, I thought that it was arbitrary, apparently flew in the face of our manifesto commitments on immigration and was potentially invidious in its application. It was with those preconceptions that I went to see the position for myself, in an unsponsored visit to Hong Kong during the Christmas recess. The object of my visit was not only to see the territory but, more importantly, to see the problem within the context of China as a whole.

I learnt a salutary lesson, because the Chinese authorities left me stranded for four days in north-west China. Perhaps that is the best possible reason to make a sponsored visit rather than an unsponsored one. However, it gave me a chance to see more of the real China. My visit took place during the imposition of martial law following the horrors of Tiananmen square. Perhaps at no other time has the contrast between the vibrant prosperity of Hong Kong and the depressing mood and relative poverty of China been so marked.

For the first time, I recognised the justification for the sense of vulnerability and real fear of the Hong Kong Chinese, many of whose families had fled communism in the civil war. On the other hand, the People's Republic of China has been relatively pragmatic in its treatment of Hong Kong during the years. It has refused to recognise the cession of Hong Kong island and Kowloon or the lease of the New Territories, but it has tolerated an historical legacy. By doing so, it has benefited enormously from Hong Kong's economic links with the outside world. It is not only in its own interests but in those of Hong Kong and British business for the territory to remain stable.

While we cannot predict the outcome of the unresolved power struggle in Peking, the lesson of recent history is that even hard liners from Mao Tsi-Tung onwards recognised that Hong Kong's special status was to everyone's mutual benefit, and that any interference—which was possible at any time—would be counter-productive. Even if we take the bleakest view of China's future—that if, in the absence of any history of democracy or any sizeable ethnic minorities that could break away, China were to remain the last bastion of communism in the world—there is little, if any, incentive for China totally to disrupt Hong Kong's unique way of life. However, while that possibility exists, it is for us to take what steps we can to stabilise the position, pending the reforms that we hope to see in Peking. I heartily endorse the comments from hon. Members on the importance of establishing and maintaining a civilised exchange of views with Peking.

The Chinese have consistently argued that all Hong Kong inhabitants of Chinese race are their compatriots, and thus any granting of British passports could in itself be interpreted as provocative. Any force-fed process of democracy in that territory is even more provocative. Therefore, we are talking about compromise and how many passports must be issued to anchor the key people in Hong Kong. The general feeling seems to be that we have got the number about right. China's greatest incentive to respect Hong Kong's position is that Hong Kong continues to be its gateway to trade in the outside world.

I went to Hong Kong and China as an agnostic. Many Conservative Members will continue to doubt the wisdom of my right hon. and learned Friend's policies, but having made the offer, the consequence of withdrawing it now would be catastrophic. There would be a crash of confidence in Hong Kong, and all our responsibilities towards the territory's inhabitants would be thrown out of the window. The combination of my right hon. and learned Friend's policies and the long-term interests of China in the region combine to give the best chance of solving this delicate issue in an honourable way.

We have heard a great deal today of the Opposition's so-called policies, but they constitute unprincipled, empty opportunism. The Government's proposals should be supported on practical, political and moral grounds.

8.37 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Had it not been for the events of 4 June in Tiananmen square, this debate would not be taking place. Therefore, it is necessary to measure the Bill against the necessities that arise from the events in Tiananmen square. The Bill is totally inadequate because if we consider whose human rights are most at risk as a result of Tiananmen square, it is not necessarily the business men, the people with skills and those who are being selected as a result of the Bill who have most to fear from the Chinese after 1997.

What astounds me particularly about the Tory party is its willingness to appease Stalinism in China as it was never willing to appease Stalinism in the Soviet Union during the Stalinist period and afterwards. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) made a remarkable speech on that point. He made an apologetic speech for the Chinese regime.

There will come a time, I hope in the not-too-distant future, when changes will take place in China as they are now taking place in eastern Europe. I do not want to be pointed at as one who refused to support the democrats when they had their backs to the wall in Tiananmen square and for the way in which they are now being dealt with by a Government who are willing to give way to the Chinese. The Bill appeases the Chinese Stalinists in Peking. It in no way seeks to protect the people who will be most at risk such as the students who led the way in demonstrating in Hong Kong their opposition to the Peking regime. Many of those who demonstrated in Hong Kong had fled from Stalinism in the years before 1989. Those who have most to fear are the students who, when I was at the terminus to the Star ferry last August, were collecting petitions full of signatures of people to support their counterparts in Peking. We must measure the Bill in terms of human rights and it totally fails to deal with that problem.

The Labour party has put forward a belated argument for democracy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) rightly said, it has been neglected during the decades by successive Governments of both parties.

However, it must be said that Hong Kong is a unique colony in that its population never sought independence, unlike, say, India or Cyprus. People did not form independence parties in Hong Kong when they became politically active. On the contrary, those who were politically active there took the side either of the Chinese Communist party or of the Kuomintang.

Now we need to look at the rights of the people of Hong Kong. My right hon. Friends the Members for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) have made it perfectly clear on a number of occasions where the Labour party stands in respect of the democratic rights of the people of Hong Kong. Long before 1997—indeed, by next year—they should be moving towards full democracy and a Legislative Council that is wholly elected by the people of Hong Kong. That is one way in which we can exert pressure on the Chinese Government.

It is not, however, the only way. When Conservative Members argue that the Labour party proposes no alternative, they are wrong: there is another way. My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton has spelt out other groups of people who should be considered for the right of abode in Britain. My hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) made it clear on Radio 4 this morning that a Labour Government would act with the international community. Britain has its connections with the European Community and the Commonwealth——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Woolly.

Mr. Wareing: It is not woolly. Most of the people who leave Hong Kong for western countries do not go to Britain, so there must be some accord with Canada, Australia and Singapore. Between 1981 and 1986 no fewer than 197,887 Hong Kong people went to western countries, of whom only 9,257 came to the United Kingdom—just 4·79 per cent. Quite apart from their natural dislike of Thatcherite Britain, we do not exactly have the cultural atmosphere to attract many people from Hong Kong.

It is ludicrous to say that handing out passports more liberally to the people whom it is the responsibility of the British Government to protect would result in an invasion of 6 million people. To bring pressure to bear on the Peking regime we need an international conference to discuss the problem of the colony.

It is a peculiar argument, advanced by the Government, that we must prevent people with skills from leaving Hong Kong since Hong Kong's economy demands that skills remain there—we do not want a run on the Hong Kong dollar, or people fleeing from the colony. So it is strange that the only 50,000 people to be offered the right of abode in the United Kingdom will be precisely those with the skills. Hong Kong does not have an abundance of skills. The plastic mould and dye industry of Hong Kong is desperate for more skilled workers; it is an industry that is basic to everything else—toys, electronics and so on—and it is suffering.

There is much opposition in Hong Kong to the attitude of the Singapore Government, who have offered access to Singapore to 25,000 Hong Kong people over the next five years, because the sort of people whom they are taking are not the sort who will suffer because of their political views—dissent from Peking over Tiananmen square, for instance—but the sort who have skills and who can help the Singapore economy.

Not only is this legislation appeasement of the Stalinists in Peking, but it is hasty legislation that should have been brought before the House only after full discussion with our international partners. Even under a Tory Government the Canadians have been far more generous and imaginative than this Government have ever been under this Prime Minister.

Despite the fact that I dislike the attitude of some of the Conservative Members whom I shall be joining in the Lobby tonight, I have no compunction in saying that this is a thoroughly bad Bill that I cannot support.

8.45 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I do not know whether being called at this late hour means that I am supposed to start winding up the debate from the Back Benches, but one theme that has clearly emerged from the debate, most of which I have sat through, is the widespread revulsion at the bizarre and opportunistic manoeuvring of Labour Front-Bench spokesmen. Those of us who have tried to seek an all-party approach to the difficult problem of how to keep people in Hong Kong and prevent the collapse of the territory have been baffled by the stance of the official Opposition. How can they seriously argue that elitism applies to midwives, physiotherapists, or police or fire officials? To do so is to get the whole issue out of perspective. The position of the Labour Front-Bench spokesmen was devastatingly destroyed by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), who made a fine and honest speech. There is no glory in the position adopted by Labour Front-Bench spokesmen and it is sad to think that these are people who might one day seek to form a Government of this country.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends are worried about the impact of the legislation. Of course if our immigration laws and our defences against further mass immigration were to be weakened by legislation, that would be a matter of grave concern and those who expressed such concern would deserve the fullest sympathies of the Government and of those of us who support the Bill. I should not support it if I felt that it opened the way to more mass immigration into this crowded country.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) and some of his supporters have been kind enough to send a letter to Conservative Members. It was nice to get a letter from my right hon. Friend; I do not get many from him. In his polite letter he set out his fears and those of his colleagues, which fall into two categories. There are immediate worries, and there are longer-term worries—in both cases, that the Bill will not work.

The immediate fears of my right hon. and hon. Friends, reiterated by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), are that a group of people now somehow stuck in Hong Kong will be released by getting their hands on British passports and coming here. That is a travesty of the truth. In fact, thousands of people—key workers—are leaving Hong Kong in droves day after day, week after week. They are heading as fast as they can for Australia, Canada, the United States and even South Africa, with a consequent haemorrhage of talent. It is not a question of our provisions releasing those people and allowing them to escape—to use the misleading verbiage of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook; it is a case of enabling them to stay, because key workers of Hong Kong are moving out in enormous numbers and those numbers will increase.

Almost everyone who can find a way through to an overseas passport is doing so—not only the living. I read that some of the dead are also being moved out of Hong Kong by their relatives: people's ashes are leaving the colony. When a licence has not been procured for the removal of the remnants of those who have died, they are taken aboard the nearest Boeing in carry-on luggage and transported overseas.

The idea that people have been kept in the colony and that our provisions will release them is an inversion of the reality. The reality is that our provisions are the one thing that will ensure that those people stop going so fast. That is the thing that we must concentrate on and that is what we must watch to see whether the legislation achieves it. My understanding and my belief is that it will have a considerable effect in slowing down the present exodus of talent.

There is also an argument that in the short term we cannot do anything because China is in a bloody-minded mood, that that is what undermines confidence, and that merely passing the legislation will not increase confidence.

I agree that in the longer term China is the key to confidence, prosperity and stability in Hong Kong. But there are things that we can do in the shorter term and are seeking to do. We have made a move on the Vietnamese boat people and, as a result, we have the welcome news that the number of Vietnamese boat people is falling dramatically. We have made some moves on democracy. I happen to agree more with some Opposition Members than I do with my Government on that. The Select Committee had strong views about pushing the democracy issue as fast as possible. Every effort should be made to make the Chinese understand that a fast development of democracy is right. By 1995 we should certainly open up the issue again.

Finally, we are seeking, through this measure, to keep in Hong Kong some of the key workers who otherwise are leaving at a great rate. That is what we are doing in the short term. The issue of them escaping and how many we allow into Britain, or what numbers will crowd into this or that part of the United Kingdom in the short term, simply does not arise. It is hard to find anyone in Hong Kong among those who now wish to emigrate who wants to come here anyway. I do not believe that they will. Anyway, that is not the purpose of the legislation. This is not an immigration issue in that sense, and viewing it through that lens has led the Opposition into their miserable and ill-supported stance on the matter.

As for the long term, those of my hon. Friends who are doubtful say that after 1997, or even before, everyone who has one of the passports will come to Britain because the Chinese will take a hostile attitude to foreign passport holders and see them off. I must tell those who have doubts that if by 1997 or before there is still hostility and extreme surliness about Hong Kong in Peking, regarding it as a centre of subversion, it will be not 225,000 people coming, but 3,225,000, or indeed even 5 million people, all of whom will regard the United Kingdom as a place of asylum. Under the United Nations refugee convention of 1951 we are pledged to provide asylum to genuine political refugees. That is the nightmare that lies behind the undermining of confidence now. That is why we must work night and day to reassure Hong Kong now in the convalescent years of the early 1990s, to see that somehow we avoid that horrific prospect.

I do not agree with those who say that the Chinese do not really understand these things. They understand them very well indeed. They understand that there is a case for people having a passport as a form of reassurance. A senior Chinese Minister told the Select Committee when we visited Peking before Tiananmen square that he understood quite clearly, because in China there was a saying that a clever rabbit has two boltholes. The Chinese had no difficulty in understanding exactly what is intended. I know that since then they have taken a rather more hostile tone, but they understand the position exactly.

I should have liked to see a right of entry or right of abode being given, not passports. But that perfectly sensible idea was yet one more thing dished by the manoeuvrings of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and his colleagues who said that they would reverse anything of that kind that was put forward. That is why the Government had to go for passports.

We shall need much greater and more vigorous international efforts than we have seen so far to get others to combine in the reassurance process over the next few years. The operation will need to be monitored by the House. I am not offering or volunteering, but the Select Committee might have a part to play in seeing how policy develops in Hong Kong over the next few years.

I must tell Opposition Members and my right hon. and hon. Friends who see the issue in the narrow terms of apparent great influxes of immigrants that that is not the prospect. The question is whether we can get Hong Kong through the immediate difficult years that lie ahead. The Bill will not solve everything by any means. But it is a litmus test of whether we are a nation that understands the wider world or whether we have turned in on ourselves in a pititful mood of short-termism and parochialism. I know where I stand on that issue.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): The House will not turn its back on the residents of Hong Kong or relax its continuing concern and commitments to their welfare. The question is how that is best achieved. It was always known that Hong Kong would not obtain independence like other colonies. We cannot escape, or wish away, the facts of the geography or history of Hong Kong. One of the central realities is that the lease runs out in 1997. The position in international law is clear.

We cannot tow the colony away, nor is it remotely realistic, as some have suggested, to imagine that we can transport the population of some 6 million halfway round the globe and put them in Surrey, Sussex, Somerset or our inner cities. A moment's reflection shows how unbalanced and inappropriate such a proposition is from every point of view.

The essential truth is that the future of Hong Kong cannot possibly be separated from that of China. It is the relationship with China that is all-important, and it is that which we have to get right and on which we should concentrate.

In December 1984, Britain negotiated the joint declaration with the People's Republic. It was a first-class agreement. It allowed basically for one country but two systems. Hong Kong is to be allowed to keep its social system and economy and considerable autonomy for at least 50 years. Remembering that the alternative to the agreement with China is no agreement, merely the expiry of the lease and the reversion of sovereignty, it was a satisfactory and beneficial agreement.

The joint declaration is a solemn international agreement registered at the United Nations. The Chinese and British Governments have entered into commitments and obligations under the joint declaration, and the Chinese have recently reaffirmed them. The terms of that agreement should be strictly adhered to by both sides. We should do nothing to damage, threaten or jeopardise the agreement. Its implementation is by far the best prospect for the future.

But then came Tiananmen square, the bloodshed and the brutal suppression of the demonstration a year ago. There was, rightly, worldwide revulsion and condemnation, especially in Hong Kong. Everyone was appalled. But are we to say that what happened in Tiananmen square is somehow China's last word for all time? Are we to say that that will be an inevitable regular occurrence; that in all perpetuity the Chinese army will regularly attack its own people; and that in 1997 the Chinese army will march into Hong Kong and massacre everyone? Should we expect that to be the most likely prospect, so that the agreement is now worthless?

In considering that, the events in eastern Europe should encourage us. We all remember the tanks on the streets of East Berlin, Budapest and Prague. Yet we have now seen genuinely free multi-party elections and the blossoming of freedom and democracy. Why assume, almost as an act of wish fulfilment, a worst-case scenario? Why forecast Armageddon in China?

We know that even last year there were different views in China, even at the highest level, on what to do about the demonstration in the square. It would be mistaken to believe that there are no sane voices. One thing is certain: the geriatrics who ordered the bloodshed will not be around much longer. There have been many upheavals and much turmoil in China over the past 40 years which have baffled outsiders—the great leap forward, the cultural revolution and the changes in leadership. However, I think I am right in saying that throughout that period China has kept to its international agreements. No hon. Member knows what the position will be in seven years' time. Why should we assume that it will be worse rather than better?

The Basic Law, for the mini-constitution passed on 4 April in Peking, set out the rights for Hong Kong citizens after 1997. It said that, after China resumes sovereignty over Hong Kong, it will nevertheless enjoy as a "special administrative region" of China. It said that Hong Kong's capitalist system and "way of life" will remain unchanged for 50 years. It will have independent finances and its own tax system, keep its currency—the Hong Kong dollar—and remain a free port outside the Chinese customs area. While overall responsibility for defence and foreign affairs will rest with Peking, Hong Kong will be authorised to handle "relevant external affairs" on its own. All that was agreed last month. That is obviously the best way forward for Hong Kong. Everyone concerned should strive to see that it works, and not take steps that will jeopardise it.

No one can prophesy what the world will look like in seven years' time, who the personalities in power in Peking will be or, for that matter, who they will be in London; but there is no reason to suppose that the international agreement will not be adhered to. It will be in everyone's interests, including China's, to adhere to it.

At this stage, it is the opposite of helpful for people to talk about Armageddon. Such a nightmare "end of the world" scenario would have to be dealt with not by this Parliament or the next, but by the Parliament after that. It would be the height of irresponsibility to start moving populations round the world now on a permanent, irrevocable basis because of transient factors or hypothetical future circumstances. I doubt whether those concerned or their offspring would have cause to thank us for that.

What the Government propose in the Bill is a bizarre lottery with 50,000 British passports, catering for some 250,000 people, as prizes to be competed for under a grotesque points system. For example, anyone over the age of 51 would incur negative points; those who have laboured long in the British service would therefore be discriminated against. The majority would be from the private sector. For business men, the points would take account of earnings

> "as a measure of success and value to Hong Kong."

For ordinary residents there is nothing. Those passports would obviously be highly prized and much sought after in an unseemly scramble in which there would be winners and losers, and many disappointed people.

Donald Tsang, the Hong Kong director of administration, says that 750,000—15 times the number of passports—will apply, and that most will be disappointed. As a neat Thatcherite touch, all applicants will be charged a fee, whether they are successful or not. All that is supposed to bring confidence to Hong Kong. How does it give confidence to those on the lower deck to tell them that it is necessary to give out lifebelts, but only to a few of the chosen on the bridge? This move will encourage everyone to think that they should have a passport; lack of confidence is thereby engendered as a self-fulfilling prophecy.

As for the inane idea that giving passports will stop people leaving or using them, why in that case not give them to everyone? There was no consultation with the Chinese, who have said that they will not recognise them, or dual nationality. The passports cannot be used to enter or leave Hong Kong after 1997. Ownership of them will almost oblige their holders to leave before 1997; which is the opposite of what the Government say they intend.

Let no one pretend that the Bill can do anything for confidence. It will be totally counter-productive. Andrew To, a student leader, said that it would not restore confidence. He said that he was against any scheme that tried to divide Chinese loyalties. Instead of precipitating and encouraging a mad rush for British passports to get out of Hong Kong, and thus destabilising the colony, the Government should work to reaffirm and make a success of the joint declaration, which gives Hong Kong a further 50 years of autonomy after 1997—much the best prospect for the future. If—although there is no evidence of it yet —things look as though they are likely to go badly wrong, it will be for a future Parliament to address the problem, and not for us foolishly and irresponsibly to precipitate it unnecessarily now.

[Mr. Ron Leighton]

9.3 pm

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): In the few moments I have, I wish to speak briefly on the effects of the Bill on the British people. After 40 years of mass immigration, although considerable numbers are still coming in, people were beginning to think that at least primary immigration was over. People looked to the Conservative party to be stricter on immigration controls than any of the other parties. The Conservative party has promised to end mass immigration, but now we are talking of allowing up to 250,000 Chinese people in Hong Kong the right to come and live here, let alone their dependants and others who may follow them. It is no use the Government saying that only a proportion will exercise that right; that is far too much of a gamble for most people in an uncertain situation.

Speaking against the Bill is an occasion for immense sadness for me, because it is the first time that I have ever differed from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on an important matter. My admiration for her is unbounded, and I am deeply sorry to find myself opposed to her when her great services to Britain are being forgotten and she is the subject of so much attack and vilification in the press and the media. She always has a close understanding of how the ordinary people in these islands think and feel, and I can only assume that she was charmed by some of the emissaries from Hong Kong and persuaded by her Cabinet colleagues to go against her own fundamental instincts.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, whom I admire, was originally opposed to the Bill. I was disappointed that his opening speech did not contain a single sentence about the effect of the Bill on the British people for whom he is ultimately responsible. That leaves my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Foreign Office. The position of Foreign Secretary is one of the greatest in the land and he has to defend our interests abroad and at home. In the last resort, even the humblest among us must look to the Foreign Secretary for protection. In this particularly difficult situation, it would appear that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has preferred to look after the interests of the Chinese people in Hong Kong rather than the interests of our people at home. I do not understand how my right hon. Friend can defend that judgment.

What have the Hong Kong Chinese done to be given such special privileges over and above the rights and duties that the Foreign Secretary owes to ordinary English men and women who have never voted for immigration, who never liked it and who wish it to stop? They do not want or like a multiracial, multicultural and multi-religious society compared with the old wonderful social cohesion that we had in these islands which made our history so successful and unique. We are now facing the problems of that mixture in our small island. The Bill will reopen all those old wounds and produce a further loss of confidence in the Government when they are going through a difficult patch.

Some will say that these immigrants are millionaires, cultured people and entrepreneurs. They may be marvellous people—I saw them in Hong Kong and there was much there that I admired—but they are still people of foreign extraction and we have too many of those here now. Therefore, I oppose the Bill with all the feeling that I can command. My entire political life has been to try to preserve all that is best in England. If I were not to oppose the Bill, I would be declaring all my political life to have been one long lie.

I am extremely sorry that we should make such a serious decision. It will not please the Chinese Government, it will worry the Chinese in Hong Kong, it will be extremely difficult to work out and it will have a most depressing effect on the people of this country. I have not received a single letter in favour of the Billl, from the immigrant population or the indigenous population in my constituency or from anyone else; but I have received many against it.

What are we doing as a Conservative Government, the trustees for the ordinary people in this country, but letting them down in such an appalling way? It is a matter of great shame to me, and I cannot understand why it is being done. I am sure that it has been hurriedly thought out and not thought out properly. I fear that the debates here, which will be long and hard in this difficult summer, will create awful problems for the Government. When the Bill is passed, it will cause further problems and headaches for the governor and officials of Hong Kong.

Nor do I like officials in Hong Kong, who are not accountable to anybody, deciding who should enter this country and be a subject of the Queen. This is a new Bill and a new change, as the War Crimes Bill was a new Bill. We must stop bringing such new Bills before the House. We do not like this Bill, we do not want it, and I hope that it will be defeated.

9.9 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The House should be well aware that the Labour party has firmly opposed the intention behind the Bill ever since it was first announced more than nine months ago. We described it as a charter for those with influence and affluence, and as elitist and unworkable. When it was published before Easter, our view was decisively confirmed. Before I sit down, I shall take the opportunity of replying to the debate to set out in detail the Labour party's policy on Hong Kong.

We said that the scheme was unworkable. In 1988, the Home Office processed 70,800 citizenship applications, with 361 staff employed for that purpose. For the processing of the hundreds of thousands of applications for passports expected under the Bill, seven officials will be specifically allocated. That is what the financial memorandum to the Bill states.

We said that the Bill was elitist. Under its scheme, points for passport eligibility are to be awarded, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) said, on the size of earnings as a measure of success as well as for substantial financial investments. I am not surprised that, deriving from a party that once traded in the sale of honours, Social and Liberal Democrats support a Bill that introduces a trade in passports.

We said that the scheme was elitist. Two categories in the Bill, totalling 6,800, will mainly confer those passports on privileged persons invited to apply by the governor of Hong Kong, basing his decision on personal knowledge and contacts. That is a recipe for favouritism and cronyism in the award of United Kingdom passports.

We did not realise that the Government's proposals would be such a complete muddle. The hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes) rightly described the Bill as "not thought out properly". We do not know even now whether the complete scheme is before the House. During his ludicrous visit to Hong Kong last week, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, as he clowned his way around the colony, referred to an additional passport plan under which British companies will be able to second senior employees to Britain for a period that would make them eligible for passports. That would introduce a novel and totally unacceptable principle under which recipients of British passports would be selected by private individuals running companies.

Nor could we have forecast that the scheme would be so nonsensical. On the age criterion, positive points are awarded only for applicants aged between 30 and 40. At all other ages, points decrease. Under the experience criterion, 10 points may be awarded for each year of relevant work experience up to a maximum of 15 years. Between the ages of 25 and 30, and between 40 and 45, applicants will gain points for experience but lose points for being either too young or too old.

To understand the full absurdity of the scheme, let us consider the case of a woman aged 64 holding the office of Prime Minister. She would probably be regarded by the Home Secretary as a key worker. For the experience factor, she would receive a maximum of 110 points, and for education and training, she would receive up to another 100 points. British links could get her a further 50 points, and knowledge of English would probably clock up another 50, despite her tendency to confuse the singular and plural first person pronouns.

Under the special circumstance heading, as the criteria are subjective and non-accountable, she might win 50 more points for exceptional merit or outstanding achievements. On the other hand, she would win no points for public or community service, as such service in an official capacity is excluded from the scheme. So far, she wins up to 360 points out of a possible 800. However, she loses 200 points for being over 60, and ending up with only 160 points, she unfortunately would not qualify for a passport.

The scheme is not only ridiculous, but is being put forward on an unprecedented basis. As his colleagues have done before him, the Home Secretary, echoed by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), said that the intention behind the Bill was that passport holders would not take up their right of entry to Britain. This is the first time in my 20 years in the House that I have heard a Government ask Parliament to enact a Bill on the explicit assurance that it will not be implemented. It is hypocritical to ask the House to pass any Bill unless the Government intend it to come fully into operation.

The Government are seriously misleading the House by claiming that the Bill will anchor passport holders to Hong Kong. The Chinese Government have made it brutally clear that, after Hong Kong becomes part of the People's Republic in 1997, the passports issued under the Bill will not be valid for leaving or entering Hong Kong, and that, to quote the words of a senior official of the Chinese Government who is dealing with these matters, the passport holders

> "will be considered Chinese citizens and thus will not be entitled to British consular protection after 1997."

In the light of such repeated pronouncements by the Chinese authorities, those awarded passports under the scheme, far from being anchored and encouraged to continue the administration and business life of Hong Kong, would be far more likely to use them to come here while the going was good and while the passports could be used. The Home Secretary was completely wrong in his response to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) on this matter.

Mr. Adley: To get the point clear, will the right hon. Gentleman agree that his point about the Chinese Government's attitude to the passports has not just emerged, but was referred to specifically in two memoranda, both of which were signed by both Governments in 1984?

Mr. Kaufman: The Chinese Government have made their position increasingly clear. On the very day that the Foreign Secretary announced the scheme, they made their position clear again. The Government should have been in no doubt on the subject.

In an effort to stampede support for the Bill, the Government have made much of what they call the "flow of emigration" from Hong Kong. The Home Secretary did so again this afternoon, as did his right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell). They claim that only this scheme can staunch the flow of emigration from Hong Kong. The fact is that, although there is, understandably, great concern in Hong Kong about its future after 1997, substantial emigration from the colony is nothing new.

When the House debated Hong Kong in July 1988, almost a year before the Tiananmen square massacre, the then Foreign Secretary, now Leader of the House, said:

> "I turn now to another source of concern—emigration from Hong Kong . . . There can be no doubt that it is real, particularly among the professional and middle classes. Even so, the scale should not be overstated. We should remember that Hong Kong has had a tradition of emigration throughout its history. In the early 1970s the numbers emigrating were higher than they have been in the last few years."—[Official Report, 15 July 1988; Vol. 137, c. 702.]

The latest figures show that, whereas in 1989—which included the six months following the Tiananmen square massacre—those emigrating from Hong Kong numbered 42,000, in 1988 the number emigrating was 3,800 higher, at 45,800. I do not seek to minimise the understandable apprehension caused in Hong Kong by the massacre but it was always inevitable—even without such horrific events—that there would be substantial emigration as 1997 approached. The Bill will not stem that emigration; it will give it added impetus.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): The right hon. Gentleman seems to be suggesting that people who obtain passports will come here as quickly as they can. Is he aware that, since last July, the Singapore Government have accepted applications from 17,000 heads of household in Hong Kong, of whom 600—just 3·5 per cent.—have taken up passports? Is it not likely that the same would occur here?

Mr. Kaufman: The fact is that China will not take over Hong Kong until 1 July 1997, so there will be a considerable period during which passports will be available after the Bill is passed. All the indications are that the impetus will be there for those who are awarded the passports to use them for travel while the Chinese Government will not prevent them from doing so.

Mr. Budgen: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but after that I hope that the House will forgive me if I impose a moratorium on interventions.

Mr. Budgen: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will deal with the Opposition's important motion proposing that the Bill should be committed to a Committee of the whole House if it gets its Second Reading. He will reflect that the House recently spent four days debating the Budget, which is likely to be a matter of transitory interest within two or three months. The Bill will affect the whole country for a generation. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will do his best to persuade as many right hon. and hon. Members as possible that it would be a grave abuse of Parliament were the Bill merely pushed upstairs into a Standing Committee.

Mr. Kaufman: This is a constitutional Bill dealing with nationality, and I should have thought that the Government would volunteer to have it dealt with by a Committee of the whole House. The Government not having done that, I am surprised that the Liberal Democrats—the Liberal party was once a great constitutional party—should be voting with them to smother debate on the Bill.

There are some Conservative Members who seek to use the possible arrival in Britain of those holding passports under the Bill to provoke a racist scare. Any debate on Tory manifesto pledges on immigration must be a matter for disputation on the Conservative Benches; it is no concern of ours. The Opposition are concerned about the serious and unfair distortion of immigration policy that the Bill will bring about.

It is no good saying that the Bill does not have an immigration policy aspect. Let me tell the House about my constituent, Koon Tai Chan, a Hong Kong Chinese about whom I have received a letter from the Manchester law centre only this week. He is the brother of a British citizen, the husband of a British citizen and the father of a baby born here. He is at present subject to a deportation order. Unless the Home Secretary relents, which so far he shows no sign of doing, Koon Tai Chan will soon be permanently separated from his wife and child and sent back to Hong Kong. The only way in which his British family can stay united with their husband and father is to accompany him to Hong Kong—a place whose future the Government regard as so precarious that they propose to provide a lifebelt under the Bill for 225,000 of the colony's most influential and affluent citizens.

Koon Tai Chan is not essential to Hong Kong's business life or administration; he is simply a cook. The Home Secretary would no doubt add that, as an overstayer under the terms of the Immigration Act, he is what the Home Office calls a "bad case". To me, Koon Tai Chan, with a British wife and a child in my constituency, is a better "case" than all those who will receive passports under the Bill, and there is no way that I propose to agree to the passage of a statute that will perpetuate—indeed, make far worse—the heartless injustices of the Government's immigration policies.

Such injustices apply to citizens and residents of this country originating not only from Hong Kong, but from the Indian sub-continent and from other areas as well. Those who will get passports under the Bill will not have to submit to DNA testing, to humiliating medical examinations or to the primary purpose rule. They will not be subjected to offensive questioning of the kind that I heard in the immigration department of the British high commission in New Delhi last week. A man who wanted to come here for a short visit to attend a wedding was subjected to a catechism that included inquiries about how many acres of land he rented and what the annual return was on that land.

The people who receive passports under this Bill will not have to wait hours in a hut for an interview, as did an Indian university professor last week at the New Delhi high commission. Under this Bill, if he was a Hong Kong Chinese, he would probably get enough points to qualify for a British passport. However, as an Indian, he had to wait for hours simply to plead for a tourist visa.

In any case, the Bill is not even increasing confidence among its prospective beneficiaries. While awaiting publication of the Bill, Dame Lydia Dunn of OMELCO stated on 4 July last year that the creation of categories would be divisive and difficult to defend. She said that the creation of such categories would make it more difficult to govern Hong Kong. I am baffled as to why she has gone back on a series of such statements.

Many of her fellow residents of Hong Kong continue to be uninspired by the Bill. A trade union leader, Lee Chuk-Yan, said:

> "It gives one more choice to people who already have lots of choices. It gives nothing to those who have no choice."

An opinion poll in Hong Kong a few weeks ago showed that 90 per cent. of executives, professionals and entrepreneurs—the people whom this scheme is designed to impress—doubt whether the package will achieve its objective, while 86 per cent. of younger Hong Kong residents regard the passport plan as irrelevant.

Rev. Lo Long-Kwong who leads a group called "Hong Kong People Saving Hong Kong" said of the Bill:

> "It is unbalanced and people who do not fall within these categories will feel deserted and unimportant. This does not help the whole society to face the confidence crisis."

A scheme that divides employees in both the private and public sectors into selected and rejected will make the colony harder, not easier, to run.

I cannot understand the Home Secretary's argument that the 96 per cent. of the Hong Kong population who will not qualify will somehow gain confidence from the knowledge that 4 per cent. of their wealthier and more influential compatriots are to be passengers on Waddington's ark.

No doubt it is that adverse reaction among alleged beneficiaries that led the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonealth Office, the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude), to indulge in Hong Kong last week in his comedy performance, when he went around blithely promising Hong Kong residents passports from West Germany, Belgium, Canada, Australia, France, Luxembourg and numerous other countries, amounting to 50,000 passports in all. All the countries concerned instantly repudiated what the Minister of State had said.

For example, the West German Government stated with some perplexity that the Minister of State's statement was "a strange thing". More curtly they describe it as nonsense. No wonder the Minister of State gave journalists a telling off for what he called > "interpreting the syntax in an excessively fastidious way."

It seems that the Minister of State picked up his strange ideas from reading newspapers—a method of acquiring information that the Prime Minister would certainly not recommend. We are told that the Foreign Secretary will deal with that subject when he replies tonight. I hope that any information that he has for the House is more firmly based. The fact is that the Government's policy has been an inconsistent mess.

Mr. Couchman rose——

Mr. Ian Bruce rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kaufman: I give way to the hon. Member for Dorset (Mr. Bruce).

Mr. Bruce: Whether it is true or not, the people of Hong Kong believe that the Labour party would take away the right of abode in the United Kingdom from people for whom that was included in their passports. It would be helpful if the right hon. Gentleman could state whether that would be Labour policy.

Mr. Kaufman: That is a useful intervention and I shall certainly respond to it. [HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] Now —at this moment. When the Foreign Secretary made his statement about the scheme on 20 December, I said:

> "If the scheme is embodied in an Act, a Labour Government, on coming to office, will examine how far it has gone and how it has worked . . . A Labour Goverment will not be bound to continue it".—[Official Report, 20 December 1989; Vol. 164, c. 366.]

By that we mean, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) repeated earlier, that we shall of course observe the law as passed by Parliament, but as the Bill expressly provides for alterations to the scheme of allocation, I am sure that the Government would not abdicate the right to alter the scheme, and neither shall we. That is our position.

Mr. Marlow: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman; I am afraid that he is rising to be helpful, which I should much prefer him not to be.

On the one hand, the Foreign and Commonweath Secretary offends the Chinese by the passport scheme, but in every other way the Government cosy up to them and bend the knee to them.

When, immediately after the Tiananmen square massacre, I urged the present Leader of the House, then the Foreign Secretary, to cut off Government funding for a trade mission that was soon to go to China, the right hon. and learned Gentleman called in aid as justification for the Department of Trade and Industry financing a mission that was planned to meet the man who gave the orders for the massacre.

> "the advancement of the cause of respect for human rights in China—[Official Report, 12 July 1989; Vol. 156, c. 967].

Then, in September, I revealed the breach of the Government's own arms embargo on China with the sale of head-up displays and radar equipment for use with Mig fighter planes. We all know that, a couple of weeks ago, the Prime Minister slipped out of Downing street to attend a private dinner with the Chinese ambassador at his embassy. What signal was that cosy social occasion meant to send to the people of Hong Kong?

The Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary have long been determined to "converge"—to use the fashionable word—with China at all costs. The most unforgivable sell-out has been on progress in establishing democracy in Hong Kong. I state clearly that, in the past, Governments of both parties have had a sorry record on this issue. My hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), as well as the right hon. Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson), were right about that. Both parties have failed to give Hong Kong citizens the right directly to elect their Legislative Council. I readily acknowledge the culpability of past Labour Governments on that matter.

However, with the signing of the joint declaration in 1984, a new opportunity arose for direct democracy in the colony. We in the Labour party joined representatives from Hong Kong in urging the holding of elections. The present Leader of the House brushed aside our plea for elections to begin in 1988 and eventually announced that only 10 Members—18 per cent.—of the Legislative Council would be elected in 1991.

After the Tiananmen square massacre, we urged the Government to give confidence to the people of Hong Kong by speedily increasing the number of Legislative Council Members who were to be elected. When, in June last year, the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs recommended that 50 per cent. of the Legislative Council should be directly elected in 1991 and 100 per cent. in 1995, on behalf of the Labour party I gave immediate support to that recommendation.

When representatives of OMELCO came to Britain this January and called for one third of the Legislative Council to be elected in 1991, 50 per cent. in 1995 and 100 per cent. in 2003, we supported their case, although it was a retreat from our position and that of the Select Committee. Indeed, the present Leader of the House, when speaking to the House last June, seemed to favour OMELCO's 2003 target for 100 per cent. direct elections. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about the policy?"] We shall come to the policy.

When, after eight months of procrastination, the present Foreign Secretary announced the Government's decision in February it was for only 18 directly elected Members next year—less than a third—followed by a third in 1995 and 100 per cent. not in 2003 but possibly in 2007. As was made clear by the Home Secretary's response to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), the Government have sold out to Hong Kong on democracy by making a deal with those same Chinese to whom they finance trade missions, break their embargo and sell arms and with whom the Prime Minister secretly dines. Now, as a fig leaf to conceal that sell-out, they have put forward this muddled, self-contradictory and discriminatory Bill.

The Bill does everything for the most favoured. For useful citizens such as social workers——

Mr. Tebbit: I sensed that the right hon. Gentleman was coming to the end of his speech, having given himself very little time to say exactly how his policy would work. His right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said that the Labour party had defined the categories of Hong Kong citizens whom it would admit. The right hon. Gentleman must know how many that amounts to. What is the number?

Mr. Kaufman: The Cabinet has played a numbers game within itself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] For his own purposes, the right hon. Gentleman is also playing the numbers game. We refuse to play a numbers game on immigration. We say that the Bill offers nothing to useful citizens such as social workers, or to students who risk Chinese wrath by demonstrating for democracy as they did only a few days ago. It does nothing for trade unionists, who are always at risk from authoritarian regimes. It does nothing for specific groups which will undoubtedly be disadvantaged by Chinese rule.

The Opposition believe that action is necessary but that it should be action far different from that contained in the Bill. We agree with the Select Committee that the right of abode in Britain should be given to the Hong Kong ethnic non-Chinese, the Indians. We would give them an effective right of abode with a nationality, something that the Government have not done.

Although we cannot accept the Select Committee's recommendation of limited relaxation of United Kingdom immigration law, we agree that the Home Secretary's discretion under section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act 1981 should be used generously on an individual basis to confer British citizenship on public servants who might be at risk. We would also use the Home Secretary's discretion on an individual basis to allow entry for certain other people who might be at risk under Chinese rule, such as trade unionists, journalists and political activists.

We do not believe that it is possible to obtain or offer definite international guarantees, such as those proposed by the Select Committee, for British dependent territory passport holders, but we agree that international discussions should take place with a view to obtaining assurances about policy in the event of a crisis after Hong Kong is transferred to China in 1997. Above all, we do not accept the Government's agenda or that of their opponents on their own Benches which creates the impression that the Hong Kong issue revolves solely around immigration and nationality issues.

We believe that confidence in the colony among the overwhelming mass of the population who are certain to remain there after China takes over must be buttressed and reinforced in other significant ways. That is why a Labour Government on coming to office will look positively at the position and, as time allows, at the possibility of increasing the number of directly elected Members on the Legislative Council. It is not enough simply to keep the colony in satisfactory working order for Chinese sovereignty.

We, accepting the limitations of our power, assert that, until midnight on 30 June 1997, the United Kingdom remains the sovereign power in Hong Kong and should act accordingly. We do not see doling out a number of passports, as provided in the Bill, as a proper, let alone sufficient, exercise of that power. It is a substitute for it. This is a bad Bill, and we shall vote against it.

9.40 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): As often happens when discussions take place across party lines, this has been a good, robust debate. It is remarkable that until 8·30 pm, although we had a string of Labour speeches, not one from the Back Benches was in support of the party line. Having just heard it, we can understand the reasons for that.

We are grateful for the solid, shrewd support of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker), my hon. Friends the Members for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) and for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes), who went to Hong Kong, saw the position for himself and changed his mind, and of my right hon. Friends the Members for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) and for Guildford (Mr. Howell), who has long experience of these matters. I listened carefully to the critical speeches from my hon. Friends and to the criticisms in the speeches of our supporters.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) asked about heads of households. That simply means the individual selected under the scheme who will be eligible for registration. In theory, a husband and wife could both apply, but only one would be awarded citizenship as the principal beneficiary. He asked about character checks on children. I think that he was confusing the immigration rules, where character would not be an impediment, and the provision in the Bill, which has parallels elsewhere, that a character requirement is relevant for citizenship. If one thinks of a 17-year-old with a criminal record, one can see the reasons for that.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West pressed my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary about the widows of British citizens. In Hansard tomorrow he will see that my right hon. and learned Friend covered the point, but if he is dissatisfied, no doubt he will pursue it. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore)—I am sorry that I missed both speeches—asked specifically about vulnerable people, such as political activists and journalists. They are covered by the group 3 undertakings and would be eligible under the sensitive services scheme which is part of the Bill.

One of the main themes of the debate has been our relationship with China. My right hon. Friends the Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) and for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) all touched on that. We must tread a tightrope in our dealings with the People's Republic of China over Hong Kong. We stay in close touch with China and I make no apology for that. We seek to influence China and I agree that in that respect we have a big task ahead of us. We have no wish to pick quarrels with the Chinese or to complicate the transition to the eventual transfer of power. The constitutional arrangements for the start of the democratic process in Hong Kong next year showed that policy of ours in action. We were much criticised and have been again today by the Opposition and the press in London for reaching an understanding with the Chinese on that point. Yet my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford supported me on that occasion, as did other sensible people. I think that we were right. The House should not take it that, between now and 1997, we will simply listen to every view from Peking, whether whispered or shouted, and then follow it. We did not act in that way on the constitutional question, as those who followed it know, and we shall not act in that way on the nationality question.

We are using many means to persuade the Chinese of our good faith and good sense in putting forward the Bill. Once they see that a spoiling exercise will not succeed I hope that they will come round to share our view of the Bill's merits. The truth of the matter is that we must act between now and 1997 on the judgments that we, as trustees for Hong Kong, make on what is best for Hong Kong. I do not believe that the House would wish it otherwise.

The right hon. Members for Sparkbrook and for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) came back to the issue of democracy. I believe that the policy that they now advocate is unreal. Compared with the White Paper of 1988, we have speeded up our plans, as the right hon. Member for Gorton acknowledged, for democratic reform. In the past few months, the Government had to choose to make a steady start towards democracy in the Legislative Council next year in a way that will be sustained and improved by the Basic Law after 1997. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford that we should look for opportunities for improvement before then, for example, in 1995. The choice was between making a start next year in a way that could be sustained and improved or starting next year at a higher level, which would have been immediately denounced and eventually reversed by the People's Republic of China. The more I think about it, the more I think we were right in our conclusion and that view is increasingly shared in Hong Kong.

It has been argued that the attitude of the People's Republic of China to the Bill will make the scheme unworkable. We have taken pains to explain to the Chinese that the main objective of the scheme is to stem the exodus of talented and enterprising people from Hong Kong and thus maintain Hong Kong's stability and prosperity. That is one of our obligations under the joint declaration. The provisions of the joint declaration and the Basic Law state that British and other foreign nationals may continue to serve in or be recruited to all but a small number of top posts in the future Hong Kong Special Administrative Region Government. China is willing—it is in the Basic Law—to accept that up to 20 per cent. of the Legislative Council after 1997 can be foreign passport holders.

The right hon. Member for Gorton referred to recent statements by the Chinese on consular protection. We shall ensure that the interests of British citizens will be protected to the fullest possible extent under international law. The joint declaration and the Basic Law provide that people in the SAR after 1997 will have the full protection of the law, including basic human rights as enshrined in the international covenant on civil and political rights and the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights.

The question is whether Hong Kong people are free to come and go as they please. Freedom of movement is guaranteed by the joint declaration and the Basic Law and they provide that Hong Kong people

> "may use travel documents issued by the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region Government, or by other competent authorities of the People's Republic of China, or of other states."

I promised to deal with the question of international support. Hong Kong is an international centre and it has huge international investment, and its major trading partners have a strong interest in its continuing stability and prosperity. On that basis, some countries, already of their own volition, have started to provide such international support and we have encouraged others to do so. Singapore has already introduced a scheme covering up to 25,000 heads of household. Within the European Community France has already implemented a scheme to provide for the right of entry to employees of French companies and their families. In the past few days the Belgian Government have announced a similar scheme and Germany and Luxembourg are finalising schemes broadly of the same nature. The House may know of the proposal being considered by the United States Congress that would enable Hong Kong people granted the right to settle in the United States, up to 20,000 a year, to defer settlement there until 2002. Such measures, whether they are specifically tailored to Hong Kong or reflect the general immigration policies of the countries concerned, are helpful. Taken together, they could already add substantially to the impact of our scheme.

A number of Governments are still considering schemes—this is a continuing effort on our part, and, we hope, on theirs. However, it should be clear to the House that, while it was right for us to take the lead, our scheme will have substantial backing from others. If the Bill were to fall, as The Times leading article said today, others' efforts would also be liable to fall.

British citizens from Hong Kong will have exactly the same rights as any other Community country citizen to work and settle in any part of the European Community. I have been asked about that. When we speak about those who might come here from Hong Kong as a result of the Bill, by "here" we mean not just Britain, but anywhere in the EC. We can imagine that a sizeable proportion of those who come will go to other EC countries.

I shall refer next to the main thrust of criticism from my right hon. and hon. Friends who have spoken against the Bill. I think that they would accept that in the past four months I have never joined in any criticism of Conservative Members who criticised our proposals, because I strongly endorse the need for firm but fair immigration controls. I believe, to quote our manifesto, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford did, that firm, fair immigration controls are essential for harmonious and improving community relations. I have not only preached that policy, but practised it, in contrast to the right hon. Members for Sparkbrook and for Gorton. Both my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I have worked on such matters before.

The Immigration Act 1988, put through by the Home Office, tightened the controls in the way that we promised in 1987. Consideration of immigration control has been in our mind throughout this discussion, but there is another consideration that was not there in 1987, because the 1987 election was fought before the events in Tiananmen square. The further consideration is the need to keep Hong Kong going, as our last big colony, at the level of prosperity and stability that the British interests and reputation require. We have had to reconcile those two considerations.

We decided that, due to the first consideration, we could not accept the advice of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), which he repeated today, and let in all the 3·25 million British dependent territories citizens——

Mr. Ashdown: We would not be letting them in.

Mr. Hurd: —or rather, give them right of abode. We decided that that option was not compatible with our stand on immigration control. We decided that, due to the second consideration—what one might call the Tiananmen consideration—we could not say a flat no to Hong Kong.

I readily agree, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon said, that a compromise has emerged in the Bill. It is criticised by some as going too far, and by others as not going far enough. I think, as did my hon. Friend, that we have probably got it about right.

If we had sat back, said nothing, failed to produce a Bill, and said that it was all too difficult, and if our other policies had failed and Hong Kong had degenerated into chaos and anarchy, we might have faced a refugee problem that neither law nor administration could prevent. People could have come and claimed asylum as refugees, conceivably on a scale that would make the present measure look small.

I can understand Opposition Back Benchers who genuinely favour a massive liberalisation of our immigration laws. I have listened to them for four years. I do not agree with them, but I respect their point of view. However, why is it that the Opposition Front Benchers, having voted time and again for the relaxation of particular aspects of immigration law, oppose the Bill? Is it because the people who are being offered passports are the Queen's subjects in our last big colony, rather than citizens of an independent Commonwealth country? Surely the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook can see the difference between our attitude to them and to a Sikh wishing to come from the Punjab, the stability and prosperity of which is a matter of interest to us, but for which we do not have the responsibility that we have for those in our last big colony of Hong Kong.

Mr. Hattersley: The responsibility that I believe we have in the case that I cited is to the British woman living in Britain who has a right to be united with her husband but is denied it by the Government.

Mr. Hurd: The record will show that the right hon. Gentleman equated anxiety about the position in the Punjab with anxiety about the position in Hong Kong.

Is the opposition to the Bill on the part of Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen because these are professional people who we hope will stay in Hong Kong but who, if they came to Europe, would make a strong and immediate contribution to our society? Is it because some of them work successfully in a capitalist society or in public services of high reputation? Why do Labour Front-Bench spokesmen discriminate against those key people in Hong Kong? It makes no sense in terms of the principles that I am accustomed to hearing from the Opposition; it makes sense only in terms of an unprincipled effort to embarrass the Government.

The mask of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook slipped when he accused my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary of seeking to preserve his racist credentials. The mask slipped and a nasty little bit of prejudice peeped out.

It is not true to say that the scheme will be of no benefit to the whole community in Hong Kong, which wants the public services, the prosperity and the stability of the colony to be maintained. The whole population of Hong Kong has an interest in the success of the scheme.

The right hon. Members for Sparkbrook and for Gorton were both continuously pressed by Conservative Members about numbers, but as they dodged the missiles it became clear what they would propose. I do not know which right hon. Gentleman would occupy this never-never land, but one of them would come to the House with a series of complicated propositions about immigration from Hong Kong without giving the House any idea of the numbers involved. But numbers are important when making judgments on any matter to do with immigration control.

What would the Opposition have said, what would the uproar have been, if we had produced the Bill without including numbers in it? We decided to grasp this difficulty, to fix a total and to put it on the face of the Bill, where it now is. That is the honest and straightforward way to set about a difficult problem of this sort, and it contrasts favourably with the weasly way in which the Opposition propose to set about it——

Mr. Janman rose——

Mr. Hurd: Adjectives such as divisive, elitist and privileged which have peppered the Bill in Opposition speeches were, I am told, effectively dealt with by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney. Of course a selective scheme has to select. Any process of selection, examination or even election separates those who succeed from those who do not—so much is inevitable. There is disappointment among the people who do not succeed, but I repeat that the services, the jobs, the success and the stability that we are seeking to maintain in Hong Kong benefit the whole community, not just those who get passports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes) greatly exaggerated my influence in this matter, as I assure him historians will record. He sought to draw a contrast between the interests of Britain and those of Hong Kong, but on a material point they are closely linked. Hong Kong is one of our largest overseas markets. Our trade with it, at £4 billion a year, makes it our largest export market in Asia after Japan, and the gross stock market value of British-owned, controlled or managed companies in Hong Kong has been estimated at about £20 billion. So an impoverished Hong Kong would be bad news for jobs and prosperity in this country.

The basic point, however, is that this is not a Bill for millionaires. In this world my experience is that millionaires tend to be able to look after themselves. The Bill is apt to the particular character of Hong Kong, which is a capitalist society, owing its success largely to that fact and to the Chinese genius for making a success of institutions of this kind. But it works only because it is allied to high public standards within the public and the private sectors. It is the combination of free enterprise and high standards—British standards—which has made Hong Kong a success and which the Bill's aim is to maintain by keeping in Hong Kong those responsible for the high standards.

The Bill will serve not only those who obtain the passports but all those who benefit from the standards. We do not want those standards to run down. We do not want our last big colony to end in second rate shabbiness. This is a case where our interests and our reputation run together. The Bill is not the whole answer; it is an essential part of the answer, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Bill committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that it is generally understood that the main political parties have been on a three-line Whip this evening. Obviously, when a vote involves almost the entire membership of the House, a large number of hon. Members are to be seen milling around, looking for the right Lobby in which to vote. I myself saw several Labour Members in the wrong Lobby during out first Division. I wonder whether you, Sir, might try to ensure that at least some control is exercised at the entrance to the Lobby in such circumstances so that Opposition Members know where they are going.

Mr. Speaker: The Lobby in which hon. Members vote and the way in which they cast their vote are not matters for me.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): On a similar and related point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has the Leader of the Opposition made any request to you to be allowed to make a statement about the enormous rebellion in his ranks that has so depleted the Opposition's voting numbers?

Mr. Speaker: That has never been my responsibility.

British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any administrative expenses incurred by the Secretary of State under that Act;

(b) payments into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Patnick.]

10.29 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate, especially as it concerns the allocation of additional resources for the purpose of immigration control. I listened carefully to what the Foreign Secretary had to say about the operation of immigration control under the Government. It is right to place the Bill in the context of the Government's approach to immigration control over the past 10 years —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members not remaining for the debate on the money resolution please leave the Chamber quietly?

Mr. Vaz: The Foreign Secretary and the Home Secretary seemed unaware of the misery, anxiety and distress caused by the Government's immigration and nationality policy.

I had an opportunity recently to see the way in which the Government have failed to provide the necessary allocation of resources to solve the problems in posts abroad. In particular, I refer to the position in Bombay, Karachi, Islamabad and Dhaka. I wonder whether the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department has visited, as I have, the Mahatma Gandhi building in Bombay. I visited that building a month ago and found that people who want to apply for entry clearance, not just to come here as visitors, but——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This debate is about Hong Kong.

Mr. Vaz: Indeed it is. We are debating the money resolution and my argument is that the allocation of resources for this Bill will have a direct effect on the way in which the Government conduct immigration policy. My argument falls within the scope of the money resolution because resources will be denied to those who want to apply to come to his country from other posts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The money resolution refers to this Bill, not to any other immigration measure.

Mr. Vaz: Indeed, Mr. Speaker. However, my argument is that the money that will be allocated for this Bill should be allocated for other purposes of immigration control to ease the burden on people who apply to come to this country from other posts. I want to refer to the position in Peking which will be directly affected by the Government's proposals.

If the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department was to visit Bombay—as I did—he would note that people who want to make applications must arrive at the building at 6 am. When I arrived at 10 am there were more than 400 people waiting to be interviewed by the immigration authorities. By 11 am——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am finding it very difficult to relate the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the money resolution. Can he tell me and the House how his remarks relate to the money resolution?

Mr. Vaz: Certainly, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The resolution concerns the allocation of resources for a piece of legislation to do with immigration control. My argument is quite simple. If that money is to be made available for the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill, it should also be available for other aspects of immigration——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No, the hon. Gentleman must remain within the terms of reference of the money resolution, which refers to administrative expenses. His remarks must be directed to that in relation to the Bill.

Mr. Vaz: I am sure that the Government would accept that if money is being made available——

Mr. Jeremy Hanley: (Richmond and Barnes): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Vaz: No, I will not give way.

If money is being made available in this money resolution to make it easier for people to come here from Hong Kong, administrative expenses should be made available in other posts. That is my argument. I hope that the Government will be able to provide those extra resources.

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware of the fact that five years ago I visited the building in Bombay that he has described. I was part of a delegation that was so ably led by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler). Does the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) agree that for every category of immigration applicant, the numbers waiting now are less than half what they were and that the queues have shrunk beyond all recognition——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not try to lead further astray the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), who is doing his best to keep within the terms of the money resolution and the guidance that I have given.

Mr. Vaz: I am doing my best, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall not be tempted down the road suggested by the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), who is well aware that the queues in Bombay currently stand at six months for people who wish to apply to join spouses in this country——

Mr. Hanley: It was 18 months before.

Mr. Vaz: I shall not be tempted down that road. The wait is six months in Bombay and a good deal longer elsewhere.

The situation in Peking will be affected by the money resolution, especially for those who seek to come to Britain through Peking and have to be referred to Hong Kong. I am speaking specifically about the case of my constituent, Mr. Peter Flack, a British citizen who went to China as a teacher, seconded by his local authority—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If Conservative Members will contain themselves,

[Mr. Vaz]

I shall try to explain how Mr. Flack's position is directly dependent on the money resolution. If additional resources are to be provided for Hong Kong, will the situation of persons in Mr. Flack's position—a British citizen who is married to a Chinese citizen—be improved? Currently, a case that is dealt with in Peking must first be referred to Hong Kong. In this case, Peng Ling, Mr. Flack's wife—who was involved to some extent in the uprisings in Tiananmen square—could not make an application to go to Hong Kong from China. She first had to apply to join Mr. Flack through the British embassy in Peking. She was told that she would have to wait from March 1990 until November 1990 to get an interview.

I hope that in his reply the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department will tell us whether, under the terms of the money resolution, he will allocate resources to process those cases more speedily. It is my contention that for someone to wait for eight months to join a British citizen in this country is an onerous length of time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman again, but he must not invite the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department to go out of order. I shall be a little more specific because I realise that money resolutions are not always easy to understand. This money resolution refers specifically to clause 4(1) and (2), dealing with administrative expenses. Any remarks within that scope will be in order, but any remarks outside would be an abuse of our Standing Orders.

Mr. Vaz: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am drawing my remarks to a conclusion. The administrative expenses that are provided for in clause 4 and in the money resolution should also be used to deal with the scandalous delays at Lunar house in Croydon. The Government are still unable to complete the task that they began in 1981 and to clear the backlogs. I very much hope that some of these resources will be directed to that effect.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that unlike one of my hon. Friends who also represents the city of Bradford, I do not have the same propensity for speaking on money resolutions. Nevertheless, as I contributed to the Second Reading debate, during which there were numerous references to the financial administration of the Bill, I should like to ask the Under-Secretary of State a number of questions that I hope he can answer. If not, I should be grateful if he would write to me, because there will be considerable interest in several aspects of the Bill.

One of the difficulties that now arises from the Government's decision to resist committal of the Bill to a Committee of the whole House is that many hon. Members will be anxious to raise matters relating to the Bill, but will not be members of the Standing Committee, and will therefore have great difficulty in getting the information that they will need to answer the numerous inquiries that we shall all undoubtedly receive.

As you have said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, clause 4 provides that the Hong Kong Government will pay the Home Office for the costs of the administrative provisions of the Bill and the Act, if the Bill is enacted. Paragraph 38 of the explanatory note states that the scheme would be financed by fees paid for by applicants for consideration under it and by extra fees paid for registration by successful applicants.

It is my view, which I am sure is shared by many others, that it is unacceptable that people should have to pay even to have their applications for full British citizenship put into the hat or lottery by which applicants will be considered under the scheme. There is no indication of what the fee for entering one's application will be, but as it is expected that the additional cost will be about £800,000 per annum, clearly it could be substantial.

I hope that the Minister will tell us what the application fee will be and that, if the application is not successful, the application fee will be refunded. I hope that he will also tell us what the registration fee will be for applicants who are successful in the lottery. On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to the staff implications projected in the explanatory note. We all share his amazement at the suggestion that only seven extra staff will be needed to process the estimated half a million applications. That assumes a much higher level of productivity than the Home Office nationality division, which has 361 staff in Croydon and Liverpool and processed 70,800 citizenship applications in 1988.

It is stated that the majority of places would be distributed in the first tranche as quickly as administrative processes in Hong Kong permitted. The Hong Kong immigration department is already very busy. I can bear testimony to that, because I have had discussions with the director of administration for the scheme. He is well aware of the enormous administrative burdens that will be placed on him and his staff under the scheme.

If the scheme is to be administered with the speed that Mr. Donald Tsang, the director of administration, intends —he told me last week that he hopes to have the first passports in the hands of applicants by the end of this year or early next year—many of us are worried that the projected staff implications set out in the explanatory note may not be realistic. I strongly suggest that the Minister make urgent inquiries into the staff implications in his explanatory note. Many of us believe that it would be wholly impossible for the targets that the Hong Kong administration has set to be met.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) made clear, the scheme has direct implications for the granting of British citizenship here to people who now have to wait two years and one month on average for the granting of British citizenship. Many of us would be worried if further resources were stripped from the British nationality division in Croydon and Liverpool to help deal with the flood of applications anticipated in Hong Kong.

We should be anxious if there were any suggestion that the fees that applicants here for British citizenship have to pay will be increased still further. We should be worried if the burdens on the Hong Kong administration were underestimated by the British Government in the Bill and the explanatory note, and resulted in even longer delays than our constituents now experience in obtaining British nationality.

The Under-Secretary of State will need to consider my final point, and I should be grateful if he could write to me about it. On Second Reading, several hon. Members, including me, referred to the urgent need for several reforms of the scheme which would have important implications for cost and the level of administration. We referred to the urgent need to introduce both a right of explanation and a right of appeal for applicants who are refused British citizenship under the proposed scheme.

Obviously, more administration will be required if applicants are to be told why their applications are refused and if an effective and comprehensive right of appeal is introduced. The Government will be pressed hard in Committee on those matters. In readiness for our debates, they should have clear information about how the administration would need to be improved to facilitate the suggestions that many hon. Members have made in tonight's debate and what the implications would be for the financial package.

I should be grateful if the Under-Secretary could tell us what the application fee and the registration fee will be for those who are granted British citizenship, and if he could give some indication of what contingency arrangements have been made to facilitate the improvements to which I have referred. Can he give information to justify what many of us believe is a ludicrously low estimate for the additional staff requirements, which the Government believe to be just seven extra officers?

Those are important matters, and I apologise for delaying the House. For the reasons that I have given about the inability of the vast majority of Members to participate in the Committee proceedings, it is important that we have answers tonight or early letters in reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) has placed me in some difficulty, as you made clear to him, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the Bill deals only with Hong Kong. It is difficult to reply to his points. I shall not mention that the queues in the Indian subcontinent are much shorter than in 1979 when we came to office, nor that there was a further sharp fall last year compared with 1988 because we had increased the number of entry clearance officers. However, I can set his mind at rest on the matter of cost. It will not affect immigration activities in any other way because the cost will be met by the Hong Kong Government, as the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), who seems better briefed, said.

The hon. Member for Bradford, West wondered at what level the fees would be set. We do not know because they will be set by the governor when the Bill is on the statute book, as we hope. I am certain that he will want to set the fees at a level that is reasonable for those who will apply. I am interested that the hon. Gentleman is worried about this subject. According to most Opposition Members whom I have heard, only very rich people in Hong Kong need apply. The hon. Gentleman has a principled approach and I know from his comments that he understands that many of those coming will not be wealthy, but will have skills and can make a large contribution.

The hon. Member for Bradford, West asked why only seven United Kingdom officials were mentioned in the explanatory and financial memorandum, which he considered was too small a number for the large exercise of processing all the applications. The seven officials who will be stationed in Hong Kong will not be responsible for administering or processing the scheme. They will be there to receive the recommendations of the governor on who should become British citizens, to satisfy themselves that the recommendees are of good character and, if they are, to register them as British citizens. Their job comes after the selection exercise has been carried through. We estimate that seven officials will be quite sufficient for the purpose as their job is not to administer the scheme, but to register those whom the scheme produces.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about charges and costs, and he is right that those questions will no doubt arise in Committee. He asked a specific question about appeals. We have never had appeals on questions of British nationality, only on rights of entry and abode. Basically we are dealing with nationality and I believe that a selective scheme of this nature is not susceptible to the appeal process. No doubt that matter will be discussed again in Committee.

I hope that the House has been helped by my short account of the factors that lie behind the estimates provided in the explanatory and financial memorandum. I hope that the House will support the motion.

Mr. Madden: I am grateful to the Minister and I thank him for his kind remarks about what I said. Unlike some of my colleagues, I believe that the Bill will open doors to non-European rights to nationality in this country for the first time in 30 years. I see it as a way to try to improve the overall standard of nationality and immigration procedures. In addition to the other points that I have raised in principle, can the Minister tell me whether the application fee, as opposed to the registration fee, will, in principle, be refunded to those applicants who fail to acquire British citizenship?

Mr. Lloyd: That is a matter for the governor, but I believe that he is not minded to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

PETITIONS

Human Embryo

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): I have the honour to present a petition on the protection of the human embryo from Father Tim O'Connor and 410 parishioners of St. George's church, Sudbury, in my constituency—a petition with which I entirely agree:

> Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the House of Commons will take immediate steps to enact legislation which forbids any procedure that involves purchase or sale of human embryos, the discarding or freezing of human embryos, their use as sources of transplant tissue, or as subjects for research or experiment (unless this is done solely for the benefit of the embryo concerned); and forbids all forms of trans-species fertilisation.
> And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I want to present two petitions on the subject of the protection of the human embryo. The first is from the congregation and clergy of the Holy Name Roman Catholic church, Denham, Buckinghamshire and the second is from the congregation and clergy of Stoke Poges Roman Catholic church at St. Andrew's church centre, Rogers lane, Stoke Poges.

[Mr. Tim Smith]

The petitions are identical or similar to that presented by my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson).

To lie upon the Table.

Second Severn Crossing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Fallon.]

10.54 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): This debate follows the Secretary of State for Transport's announcement on 4 April, in answer to a written question tabled by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), that he intends

> "to accept the proposal from the John Laing/GTM Entrepose consortium to design, build, finance and operate the second Severn bridge".—[Official Report, 4 April 1990; Vol. 170, c. 613.]

With great respect to the hon. Member for Cardiff North, I must say that the project will not be constructed in the leafy suburbs of Cardiff. That leads me to my first point. The announcement was vital to Wales. It should have been made on the Floor of the House. The decision and the manner of the announcement are yet another illustration of the contempt in which Wales is held by the Government.

I do not want to bore the House, but my mind is drawn back to my first Adjournment debate on this subject—on 28 October 1983—when I revealed the contents of a previously secret report prepared by an eminent firm of consultant engineers, which said that the existing bridge was in a bad state.

Leaking the report gave impetus to the demand for a second Severn crossing. A few days later, the Welsh Labour group made an urgent request for a meeting with the then Secretary of State for Transport. When we met the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), he told us in his own inimitable way that he would not dig another hole in the ground. Nevertheless, the crucial importance of a second crossing was recognised and the demand for it continued unabated.

Eventually, on 24 July 1986, the Secretary of State for Wales, in a statement to the House, gave the Government go-ahead. If I may be cynical for a moment, with their announcement of 4 April, at least the Government have stuck to the contention of the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury about not digging another hole in the ground. Rather, they have handed over the whole project and the existing bridge to a French-backed consortium. It is a shocking and disgusting decision. The Severn crossing is vital to the Welsh economy. It is our main access point. Much industrial and commercial activity depends on it. This Thatcher Government decision will not be forgotten in Wales for a long time.

Doubts are being expressed about the likely design of the bridge and its visual impact. It must blend into the landscape. What assurances can the Government give in that connection? On the English side, access points seem to have evolved into part three-lane and part two-lane dualling, provision being made to make the latter three-lane if the need arises. This is a mistake that could prove costly. It will mean bringing the contractors back some years hence. In addition, when there are difficulties on the existing bridge—there have been plenty in recent months—they will involve a wholesale diversion of traffic to the new bridge. A two-lane carriageway could not cope with such additional traffic. I urge the Government to think again.

There will be difficulties with motorway service areas. The new road schemes will make it impossible for many motorists to use the Aust service station. What plans do the Government have to deal with that?

Then there is the major issue of tolling policy. All the signs are that heavier and heavier tolls will be applied on both crossings. This is an additional tax on Wales, which is still a relatively depressed region. To put it mildly, it is most unfair. Both crossings should be in the public sector and toll-free.

The French-backed consortium will require a higher return on its investment, over a shorter period. That will necessitate higher tolls. That is the prospect for Welsh industry and commerce. Mr. Ian Kelsall of the Welsh CBI has been warned.

Some estimates seem to suggest that the cash flow for the consortium is unlikely to yield a profit until the year 2010. Such estimates are based on initial costs of opening of about £450 million, including the cost of the new crossing, finance charges and debt on the existing bridge. On top of that there could be annual costs of perhaps £80 million, including financing of debt, operating and maintenance costs. Assuming a flow of 25 million vehicles in 1995, the bridge could produce revenue of £40 million. It would seem, therefore, that the financial viability of the project rests on the assumption of a substantial increase in traffic from 1995 onwards.

There are a number of important questions to which answers from the Government are required. First, what assurance is there that tolls will be £1·40 in 1995? Are there to be allowances for increases other than inflation? Secondly, what are the assumptions about future traffic levels, and what is the basis for the Department's claim that tolls would last for only 21 years? Thirdly, are any costs to be carried by the public sector at any stage in the concession period? Is the capital debt on the existing bridge to be written down? Are the loans to be underwritten or supported in any way by central Government? If the Minister cannot provide answers to these questions tonight, I respectfully suggest that he writes to me about them in due course.

I come now to what could be called the jackpot question: what if construction costs escalate? Such increases are known in the industry as cost overruns. The overruns on the Channel tunnel have been considerable. In the event of cost overruns and of the total revenue being insufficient to meet debt and operating costs, what guarantees are there for the long-term future of the crossing?

In France, the Government have effectively had to nationalise toll motorways when the operators have pulled out. If that were to happen with the Severn crossing, the Welsh economy would be in jeopardy. The consortium has no previous experience of constructing a comparable estuarial crossing. What a way for a British Government to treat the economic lifeline of Wales. We are just being treated as an economic guinea pig in another doctrinaire experiment by this utterly discredited Government.

Early-day motion 779 stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), and I have given him notice that I shall be raising the matter. It is entitled "Second Severn crossing" and it first appeared on the Order Paper on 22 March. When I read it, I was a bit puzzled, because it gave me the impression that a Government announcement had already been made. I proceeded to make exhaustive inquiries and I discovered that no such announcement had been made. It appears that, at that stage, a last desperate attempt was being made to prevent the French-backed consortium from gaining the contract.

The parliamentary Labour party has a rule that the Chief Whip must be consulted before an early-day motion is put down. I believe that the Conservative party has a similar rule. However, I understand that no such authorisation was sought or granted for early-day motion 779. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West is a Front-Bench spokesman on social security matters.

The matter was further complicated because my hon. Friend appears to have been a little confused about where the new bridge is to be situated. He told me that it was to be in the constituency of the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland), and it appears that he gave the same impression to the Chief Whip who spoke to him about the matter. Several representatives of the media told me that he had said the same thing to them. It would seem reasonable to suggest that, before going into such an issue with both feet, it would at least have been wise to be sure of the location of a project, not to mention the propriety of raising a matter that affects another Member's constituency.

I have in my hand a letter dated 11 April from Monmouth borough council, signed by the electoral officer, saying that plans available to him show that the second Severn crossing will be in the Newport, East constituency. I am sure that the Minister can confirm that this evening.

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Robert Atkins) indicated assent.

Mr. Hughes: On the other side of the channel, the bridge will be in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Cope). We have already had preliminary discussions about how best we can help our constituents. The fact has to be faced that, when the heavy lorries and equipment move in, there will be a lot of muck and dust, together with a good deal of congestion, and people will be upset.

I remind the House that that will be happening not in Allt-yr-yn or Bassaleg in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West, but in Caldicot and the surrounding villages in the Newport, East constituency.

I conclude by saying that Opposition Members are looking forward to the early return of a Labour Government. Wales and, I believe, the rest of the country are simply fed up with Thatcherism. That incoming Labour Government will be faced with many problems. It is perfectly understandable that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition is reluctant to make commitments at this stage, and that is wise. But that incoming Government would do well to concentrate first and foremost on getting the economy right. We need much new investment, particularly in the regions, to generate long-term growth. As we know from what has happened in the Soviet Union and elsewhere in eastern Europe, it is no use redistributing less and less. To take over the two bridges and get rid of tolls would give an immediate shot in the arm to the Welsh economy, as well as providing long-term benefits.

[Mr. Hughes]

We have been promised that the whole issue of tolls on estuarial crossings will be reviewed. I accept that promise, and hope that something useful will emerge from it.

11.10 pm

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Robert Atkins): I hesitate to become involved in a quarrel between the hon. Members for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) and for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). Clearly, however, as the hon. Member for Newport, East has raised the matter—I congratulate him on being able to do so—I must answer the points that he made.

So seriously do the Government take the issue that, unusually, the Secretary of State is present, having broken an engagement for that purpose. Also present is my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Welsh Office, who has taken a considerable interest in the matter.

Given the hon. Gentleman's comments, it could be imagined that the Government's proposals for the second Severn crossing represented an iniquitous plot designed solely to impose swingeing taxes on the Welsh economy, and to subject the Principality to the whims of foreign financiers. The reality is wholly different. We are proposing to more than double the road capacity across this vital road link within the next six years. Some increase in the cost to users will be inevitable to cover the massive investment required to finance the new crossing, but we are satisfied that the Government's selected proposal represents the best overall value for money for all concerned.

The case for providing a second road crossing of the Severn estuary is not at issue. The present Severn bridge provided ample capacity for the traffic envisaged at the time of its opening in 1966, but since then the growth in traffic nationally—particularly motorway traffic—has been enormous, as I am sure that everyone is well aware. That, coupled with the successful regeneration of the south Wales economy in recent years—we might not have realised from the remarks of Opposition Members that it had taken place, but my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Welsh Office, who has been largely responsible for the improvement, is only too well aware of it—has meant that traffic using the bridge has tripled since its opening, from fewer than 6 million to over 18 million vehicles a year. In turn, that has begun to lead inexorably to congestion at peak times or during repair and maintenance works. A particular problem for the present bridge, given the exposed nature of the site, is that high winds occasionally require restrictions on high-sided vehicles, or—in extreme cases—complete closure of the crossing.

All that led the Government to conclude, as long ago as 1986, that a second crossing should be provided. Two years later, in 1988, we announced that the private sector would be given the opportunity to participate in the financing and operation of the crossing. That decision followed directly from the innovation of private funding for roads infrastructure that had been so successful in the competition for the third Dartford-Thurrock crossing.

The detailed terms for the second Severn competition were issued almost a year ago to the four selected consortia that had put in the strongest pre-qualifying proposals. The terms for that important competition confirmed the Government's objective of securing directly comparable bids from the tenderers on a privately and publicly financed basis.

The bids were received last October. After an intensive initial evaluation, we were able to reduce the list of contenders to two—the John Laing/GTM Entrepose consortium and one comprising Trafalgar House and Balfour Beatty. Both designs were established to be technically and aesthetically sound and to comply with the Government's strict engineering requirements. The final decision between the two bidders and between the financing options came down essentially to which offered the better overall value for money. The assessment took account of the costs of the scheme to users of the crossing arising from tolls and to taxpayers arising from the residual costs of the scheme to Government, taking account also of the tax receipts generated by the scheme.

As the House knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who, I emphasise, is here tonight to support this important project, announced before Easter our conclusion that the privately funded proposal from Laing/GTM offered the best value. Negotiations are starting on the detailed terms of a comprehensive concession agreement. We shall, of course, keep the House in touch with developments on that front.

Implementation of these proposals will naturally require new statutory powers, and my right hon. Friend hopes to introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity to seek parliamentary approval for the scheme. If all goes well, we hope that construction could start at the beginning of 1992, and that the new bridge could be open to traffic by the end of 1995. It is a great and significant development for south Wales and the western part of England.

It is a most exciting and vital development for the future of south Wales. It reaffirms the Government's commitment to the continuing economic development of this part of the country, by helping to ensure that its communications with the rest of the United Kingdom and with Europe are second to none. The bridge itself will be an international showpiece; at some 5 km long it will be the longest water crossing in the United Kingdom, and it will incorporate the longest cable-stayed span in the United Kingdom. The entire crossing will provide windshield protection for traffic—a world first on such a scale and structure.

Against that background, it is most disappointing—if, sadly, hardly surprising—that we have to record the carping, negative criticism which the proposal has received tonight and on other occasions from the Opposition. It is not untypical that the hon. Gentleman's criticisms, when he was not dealing with the particular problems he had with his neighbour, went over the top. The Welsh people, who rely greatly on my hon. Friend the Minister of State who represents their interests so well, will understand that the hon. Gentleman has taken the matter too far.

The hon. Gentleman made particular reference to tolls. We have heard a great deal of complaint about the level of tolls and, as hon. Members will know, there was a debate about the tolls on the existing Severn bridge. Complaints have been made about the principle of whether tolls should be charged at all. I put on record for all to see and hear that the hard fact is that it has been the policy of successive Governments over very many years—including Labour Governments—that those who derive exceptional benefits from the provision of major estuarial crossings should contribute towards the exceptional costs of putting them there. Indeed, it is worth reminding the House and everyone listening to the debate that a Labour Government were in power in 1965 when the Severn Bridge Tolls Act was enacted. That Act provides for tolls to be levied for a period of up to 40 years to cover the costs of constructing, maintaining, operating and improving the bridge, and it is on that basis that tolls are now charged.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Does the Minister appreciate that all the arrangements for the construction of the bridge had been prepared beforehand and that the Labour Government had only just taken office in 1965?

Mr. Atkins: I do not dispute that, but I repeat that the legislation under which the tolls are now charged was enacted by a Labour Government. It is no good the hon. Gentleman trying to evade responsibility for his party's commitment in that regard.

Under the Government's proposals for the second crossing, the existing bridge will be transferred to the private sector consortium, which will collect tolls on both bridges on a common basis. The promoter's powers to collect tolls will be tightly controlled. The tolls will be specified in the forthcoming legislation and the promoter's tolling period, which will not exceed 30 years, will be tied to a formula based on revenue from traffic. The more traffic which goes over the crossing, the sooner tolls will stop. On current forecasts, tolls will be needed for about only 21 years, barely half the period envisaged for the original bridge.

I accept that some increase in tolls will be needed. The proposals envisage, ultimately, an increase of about 40 per cent. for most users. That increase will be phased in up to 1995 to reduce the initial impact. For goods operators, the increases will be rather higher, but it should be recognised that the present £2 toll for goods vehicles is something of a bargain, given the value to operators of the time saved by using the crossing. On present expectations, the tolls will cease in the year 2013, only seven years after the date on which tolls for the present bridge are due to end. That is quite an achievement. All in all, we regard the proposed tolls as a reasonable price to pay to cover the £270 million capital cost of the new crossing. The overall cost to the community of this scheme will be less than any available alternative, whether it be privately or publicly financed.

Concern has been expressed tonight about the Government's selected proposals on the grounds that the consortium includes a French contracting group and that its backers include a French bank. There has been concern that the consortium's scheme may not use British materials and suppliers to the same extent as the unsuccessful Trafalgar House/Balfour Beatty alternative.

Those concerns are fundamentally misconceived. The Government most emphatically do not discriminate against British suppliers, which will be able, and well placed geographically, to compete for work related to the new crossing, but they will need to compete for that work and that includes competing with suppliers from other Community countries, just as we compete with other European companies on building projects in their countries, and are jolly successful in so doing. It is worth reminding the House that we hope that construction will start in 1992.

There is no question of the crossings being compromised by the transfer to a private sector promoter or by the involvement of overseas companies. The powers of the promoter and the operation of the crossings will be strictly controlled by the proposed legislation, in tandem with the concession agreement. Moreover, I can assure the House that under the proposals my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for Wales will remain the highway authorities for these roads and that the police will have all the usual powers to deal with traffic.

Our decision to go ahead with the second Severn crossing on the basis of the privately funded Laing/GTM proposal represents the best practical deal for south Wales. It offers the most effective means of securing the new crossing as soon as possible. The House naturally has a close interest in how the crossing will be provided, and there will be a full opportunity to debate the principles and the details of the proposal when we discuss the necessary legislation in due course.

I hope that the House will reject the carping and unnecessary criticism of the hon. Member for Newport, East and his hon. Friends about the importance of the bridge and how it will be constructed and that it will welcome the Government's positive initiative on this most vital scheme.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Licensing (Low Alcohol Drinks) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

LOW ALCOHOL LIQUOR NOT TO BE INTOXICATING LIQUOR FOR THE PURPOSES OF THE LICENSING ACT 1964

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 1, line 6, leave out from '1964', to end of line 12 and insert

'for the words "not exceeding 1016° and of a strength not exceeding 1·2 per cent." there shall be substituted the words "not exceeding 1009° and of a strength not exceeding 0·5 per cent."'.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 1, in page 1, line 11, leave out '0·5 per cent.' and insert '0·05 per cent.'.

No. 9, in page 1, line 11, leave out '0·5 per cent.' and insert '0·1 per cent.'.

No. 10, in page 1, line 11, leave out '0·5 per cent.' and insert '1·2 per cent.'.

No. 2, in page 1, line 11, leave out 'cent.' to end of line 12.

No. 3, in page 1, line 12, leave out from 'sale' to end.

No. 4, in page 1, line 16, at end insert

'at the time of the sale or other conduct in question'.

Miss Widdecombe: After that enthusiastic reception, may I apologise first to you, Mr. Speaker, and secondly to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) for the fact that I shall be unable to stay for the whole of the debate? However, I am grateful for this opportunity to speak to the amendments that stand in my name.

One of the effects of the otherwise excellent Bill that has been promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is that it will make it very much easier to obtain low-alcohol liquor outside the context of licensed premises. My amendment would bring the Bill back into line with the Licensing Act 1964, but with a reduction to 0·5 per cent. alcohol and its corresponding level of specific gravity. I am most reliably informed by a professor of physics, since I have no knowledge of physics whatsoever, that that is 1009 deg Gay Lussac. I have tried to accommodate my hon. Friend by incorporating the reductions he suggests, but I have also tried to bring back within the scope of the Licensing Act all sales of low-alcohol drinks, wherever such sales take place.

If the Bill is not amended, it will be possible to obtain that which is classified as non-intoxicating liquor—but which can in fact contain an alcohol level of 0·4 per cent., or even 0·49 per cent.—outside licensed premises. Alcoholic drinks of that kind would therefore be available to children if they were sold in unlicensed premises. According to the Bill, drinks with an alcohol content of below 0·5 per cent. will be available in all sorts of premises which do not have to be licensed to sell alcohol.

A child will understand only one thing: here is some excitement, here is a drink with some alcohol in it. Unfortunately, due to the efforts of our advertising industry and the image projected by the drinks industry, children are inclined to think that there is something glamorous, grown-up and desirable about a drink with alcohol in it. If, therefore, alcoholic drinks are readily available—perhaps with an alcoholic content of only 0·1 per cent., although it could be as high as 0·4 per cent.—children will have access to them.

We know that the problem of under-age drinking and the crimes associated with it are increasing. Therefore, it would be ill-advised for my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) to leave in an otherwise commendable Bill a loophole that would promote under-age drinking. If the Bill were enacted in its present form, teenagers and fairly young children of perhaps nine or 10 would learn to consume alcohol and, what is infinitely worse, taking it for granted.

Unlike an adult, a child cannot reasonably be expected to compute the sum of the drinks that he or she is consuming and work out the likely effect. The child will think that it is fun and exciting to consume alcohol, but that it will do no harm because it is low alcohol. But if a child consumes five or six drinks which contain only 0·4 per cent. alcohol and are therefore deemed low-alcohol, and not dangerous, he will have taken in a fair quantity of intoxicating liquor.

There are obvious dangers to a child or a young teenager whose constitution has not developed sufficiently to absorb that. If alcohol becomes a habit and children treat such drinks as if they were Coca Cola or orangeade, they will gradually develop an alcohol habit, however low. The mood of our legislation, all that the Home Office has said in recent years and certainly the social perception are that we should move in the opposite direction and encourage young people not to form a drink habit.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem of alcohol is just as relevant in Northern Ireland, and does he join me in regretting that the Bill does not seem to apply to Northern Ireland?

Miss Widdecombe: I absolutely support what my hon. Friend says. I might well have mentioned that point, but, as my hon. Friend feels strongly about the issue, he may wish to touch on it later.

If low-alcohol drinks are available they affect the problem of drink driving. At present, the law is fairly clear. If one visits licensed premises and drinks more than a low quantity of alcohol, if one is driving one is likely to be over the limit and guilty of a criminal offence.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): Further to the intervention by my hon. Friend for Hendon, South (Mr.

[Mr. Andrew Mitchell]

Marshall) has my hon. Friend noticed that clause 1 does not apply to Scotland, but that clause 2 does? Does she not find that an extraordinary anomaly? In tune with what my hon. Friend said about Northern Ireland, should that not be addressed at this stage so that we can do something about it?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: the anomaly applies to Northern Ireland and to Scotland.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): To avoid any wrong assumptions, we should be clear that, as is so often the case, the law in England is different from that in Scotland, so it was necessary to table an amendment to part II of the Bill to deal with the law in Scotland, while the amendment in part I of the Bill deals with the law in England. It is my intention that the two clauses achieve the same legal definitions and legal structure in England and in Scotland. As my hon. Friends from Scotland are nodding in agreement, I am glad that I am giving the House the right information.

Miss Widdecombe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his explanation and his clarification of the part of his Bill that applies to Scotland. Without meaning any offence to my hon. Friends from Scotland, drink is a considerable problem in Scotland.

Mr. John Marshall: I must ask my hon. Friend to withdraw that comment. I spent Easter in Scotland, and I can assure my hon. Friend that I saw no excess of alcohol. My hon. Friend is clearly referring to what prevailed in Scotland 10, 15 or 20 years ago, when one could find a drunk at Glasgow central station at any time of the day or night. Following the changes in the Scottish licensing law and the civilisation of Scottish public houses, it is no longer true that one can find drunks at any time of the day or night. Scotland is not the alcoholic country that my hon. Friend envisages. She does a disservice to the good people of Scotland.

Miss Widdecombe: I, too, spent Easter in Scotland and it was most enjoyable and pleasant. I did not spend my Easter on Glasgow central station, so I have no idea whether the level of drunkenness to be observed there has changed. I did not mean to impugn the Scots or to suggest that they uniquely have an alcohol problem. I merely said, —presumably my words are on record in Hansard—that there is a drink problem in Scotland. There is also a drink problem in England and in most of Europe.

9.45 am

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Let me add to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South. My experience in Scotland is entirely the opposite of what my hon. Friend suggests. Every summer I spend the short amount of time that I allow myself to spend away from my constituency in the north-east of Scotland. Staying near Tain on Easter Ross, I found it extremely difficult to find a drink at all. One has to travel so far to find a drink, that I spent much of my short holiday there drinking low-alcohol drinks and canned beer that I had brought with me from England. I found Scotland to be an extremely abstemious place where it was difficult to get a drink.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: I am being extremely generous in giving way, so perhaps before I give way again perhaps I can answer my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell).

Once again, he has misunderstood what I said. I did not suggest that there was an undue level of drunkeness in Scotland compared with anywhere else. I am sorry that he had a problem finding a drink during his Scottish holiday. I took the precaution of staying on licensed premises. I must admit that I did not see any signs of excessive drunkeness. I said that there is a drink problem in Scotland, as there is in England and the rest of Europe.

Mr. Walker: I would normally be in Scotland on Fridays, except when there are matters in the House that affect Scotland, as the Bill does, and I was on the Committee that considered the Bill. My hon. Friend was referring to the problem of under-age, drinking which is a matter of great concern. She is quite correct to say that there is such a problem, but I would remind her that 90 per cent. of Scotch whisky, which is Scotland's most famous export, is exported and not drunk by the Scots. I am a teetotaller. I do not drink it at all.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that we have established that there is no undue drink problem in Scotland.

Miss Widdecombe: Perhaps I can conclude the discussion of the drink problem in Scotland by apologising unreservedly if I have offended any of my hon. Friends. I did not intend any slur on the Scots.

Before my hon. Friends intervened, I was referring to drink driving. If one visits licensed premises and consumes intoxicating liquor, one knows that one must limit one's consumption severely, if one must drink at all. I should favour a law which prevents people from driving after drinking any amount of alcohol, but the present law requires only that one should severely limit the amount of alcohol one drinks. That is fairly easy to compute, and is readily understood.

If low alcohol liquor is outwith the licensing laws, the temptation will be to confuse it with alcohol-free liquor and that because one is drinking something that is only 0·3 or 0·4 per cent. proof one is not consuming alcohol. Someone may be tempted to have two drinks in a public house, which should be sufficient, and instead of drinking orange juice or lemonade to think "I will be safe because this is so entirely innocuous that it need not be licensed." He therefore consumes a drink that is so low in alcohol that it has been removed from the licensing laws. That is dangerous, and I suspect that many people may take that incremental amount of alcohol when they would normally stop because they have been deluded by the licensing laws into thinking, "This is not really alcohol at all, is it?" That is my fundamental objection.

Combining what I was saying about children and drivers drinking, and about low-alcohol drinks not being subject to the licensing laws, there will be official guidance saying, "You needn't worry about this; it isn't really alcohol." People will take their cue from that. If we are to ensure that children do not have ready access to drink, and that drivers are not deluded into thinking that a low-alcohol drink will do no harm, society and the law must lay down extremely clearly that it is intoxicating liquor, that it is subject to the licensing laws and that it is available only at licensed premises.

If society does not give that guidance, it is understandable that people will tend to think that it does not matter how much low-alcohol drink they consume, that it cannot be habit-forming because its strength is so low and that it does not matter, because if it did matter and if it was habit-forming, surely the law would require a licence to be granted. That is the mentality with which many people will approach the liberalising proposals in the Bill.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): My hon. Friend is raising spectres that worry me. I do not want people in licensed premises to be deluded into drinking low-alcohol beer, driving their motor cars, being breathalysed and losing their licences. Has she made any estimates of how much low-alcohol beer an average man, who legally can drink almost two pints of full-strength beer, will have to consume to be over the limit? How many pints of low-alcohol beer would have to be consumed to put that man near the limit?

Miss Widdecombe: It is proposed to reduce the requirement from 1·2 to less than 0·5 per cent. Assuming that the man was drinking a 0·4 per cent. strength drink, he would have to drink about three times as much as intoxicating liquor. If he were drinking low-alcohol beer as if it were lemonade or bitter lemon—one can drink six or seven of those drinks without realising it—he would be gradually consuming the equivalent of one pint of beer or one measure of spirit.

The prospect that alarms my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page), of people losing their licence, is not the most terrifying one. The most terrifying prospect is of people getting behind the wheel of a car when not in a fit state and causing accidents and deaths. It is more desirable that they should lose their licences as a sharp warning than be allowed to cause accidents.

I say again—I am well aware that it is outwith the scope of the Bill and that I would be called to order if I developed the point—that it is high time that we had a rule preventing people from driving when they have consumed any alcohol. That is the only way to guarantee safety.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Is my hon. Friend aware that the nomenclature of different beers can confuse prospective purchasers? The word "light" has been misinterpreted many times. A court found special reasons for not disqualifying a person who was over the limit because he had been informed that a beer was low in alcohol because it was called light beer. Does my hon. Friend think that there is a need for much caution, particularly among brewers, in the names given to beers, which may or may not be low-alcohol?

Miss Widdecombe: I agree with my hon. Friend and I am grateful to him for making that point. There is massive confusion, which will be compounded if certain forms of alcohol, which undeniably are alcohol but have a low content, are not subject to the licensing laws.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) raises an important gap in our approach to drink; that is in education. People should understand what they are purchasing and consuming. It is unlikely that they will if a licence is not necessary to sell certain forms of alcohol.

Imagine trying to explain to a child that all alcohol is dangerous, is potentially habit-forming, should be avoided when one is driving, has some effect on the brain cells and does this, that or the other. The child would say, "If that is so, why don't you need a licence to sell low-alcohol drinks? Surely it can't be dangerous, and can't be alcohol." The mentality that worries me, which would grow under these proposals, is: "This is not really alcohol, is it?" If it can be purchased only on licensed premises and is subject to the licensing laws, it will be regarded more as alcohol and as having all the potential dangers of higher alcohol drinks.

Education is important. I can well understand someone consuming light beer thinking that it is something to do with its light content. Such confusion is rife in our alcohol laws.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I am listening carefully to the hon. Lady, and I agree with most of her arguments. I hope that she will be a little hesitant about the nomenclature of beers. There are traditions in this country on what we call beers, which are respected and well-known. To start talking about light beers as alcohol-free is pushing it a little. There is a tradition of what we call bitter, mild and all the other lovely names that British beers have. I hope that she is not suggesting some EEC mentality about what we must call different British beers. I should like to know when I am drinking a non-alcohol beer, but we must be cautious. I and most hon. Members know what a light ale is.

Miss Widdecombe: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I represent a hop-growing area, where the EEC mentality definitely is not the flavour of the month. It would be hard for me, even should I want to do so, to make a case for introducing further legislation to assault well-established British institutions.

I was saying—if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, it is reasonable to say so—that people are confused. He may be well up in the traditions of British beers, but I am not. He may understand the description of every beer on offer, but many people, particularly first-time drinkers, do not and are confused by the terminology. I was proposing not that we should remove those terms but that there should be proper education. I was not proposing that we should amend our laws and start trying to standardise descriptions—I would not do anything so dull or dreary—but there is a strong argument for proper education.

I am particularly worried, as I have made clear throughout the debate on the amendment, about under-age drinkers. People going into public houses and learning the traditions of beers for the first time, or going into supermarkets and purchasing alcohol, do not have the benefit of the knowledge of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), and could be confused. That is an argument for education, and I sincerely hope that he did not think that I was proposing to become legislative, because my line has always been that we should reduce, rather than increase, legislation.

Mr. John Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way with her usual courtesy and for the frequency with which she has done so. She mentioned the problem of under-age drinking resulting from individuals going into supermarkets, does she not think that it is an unfortunate social trend that, whereas 20 years ago it was almost impossible to buy cans of drink in supermarkets, it is now far too easy for far too many young people to do so?

Miss Widdecombe: It is perhaps one of the most regrettable social trends that we have seen, but at least if a supermarket sells alcohol it must have a licence to do so, and as long as the definition of alcohol covers even those of low alcohol content, such drinks must be licensed. My big worry about the Bill is that a group of alcoholic drinks will be taken out of that requirement for a licence and will therefore be available in supermarkets and other shops that do not have to have a licence to sell alcohol.

Sir Peter Emery: It is terribly important that we are clear about the argument that my hon. Friend is advancing. My Bill strengthens what she wants. It will stop beers or any alcoholic drink between 0·5 per cent. and the present level of alcohol being sold in shops or elsewhere. Therefore, I hope that, if my Bill is passed, it will meet my hon. Friend's arguments. I am delighted to hear her propose them because they strengthen, rather than weaken, the Bill.

Miss Widdecombe: They would strengthen the Bill if it went as far as my amendment proposes, which is to take into account also those alcoholic drinks below the 0·5 per cent. level. I am grateful, as ever, for my hon. Friend's intervention and his clarification.

I am worried that children will be able to consume 0·1, 0·2, 0·3 and 0·4 per cent. alcoholic drinks freely, without having to buy them from premises with a licence. They will have no idea of the build-up effect and will form a drink habit. They will not understand that such alcohol, in cumulative quantities, affects the brains and organs in the same way as high-level alcohol in smaller quantities. Those children will be affected if the Bill goes through unamended.

I am worried about adults who will be lured into thinking that what they are drinking is not alcohol and will therefore think that it is safe to drink it in addition to what they have already allowed themselves before driving. I am worried that, if a range of alcoholic drinks appears saleable without a licence, it will be regarded, in general, as not really alcohol, and the social problems of drinking will not be solved by these proposals.

Therefore, I propose what, I admit is a draconian amendment. It is right and in the social interest, and before the Bill reaches the statute book, I commend my hon. Friend at least to think about whether it needs strengthening. It is likely to be on the statute book for a long time, and its social effects are likely to be far-reaching.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) has done a considerable service to the young people of this country in bringing forward his proposals. I wish them well.

The hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) wondered if the Scots took offence at what she was saying. This Scot takes no offence because, in candour, there is a problem, and those who do not recognise that would be deluding themselves. There was some banter about the position in Scotland. I was taken aback and appalled to be taken by the police in my constituency, in the early hours of the morning, to the Bathgate town centre to see the amount of drink being taken by people who, if they were not under age, were nearly under age.

My contribution has one purpose: to ask the hon. Member for Honiton to outline the contact that he has had with various Scottish authorities, because he has worked on this issue. As a Member of Parliament, it behoves me to say, bluntly, that I am not an expert on licensing and I do not pretend to be so, but it is an important issue. Therefore, I should like the hon. Gentleman to outline the contacts he has had with the various Scottish organisations, not least those representing the trade, which has a problem involving under-age drinking. How does one tell how old people are, if they are not familiar when they come into a licensed premises or a supermarket? It is easy, particularly with girls, to confuse 13 and 18-year-olds in good faith. That is part of the under-age problem.

I support the Bill and look forward to hearing from the hon. Gentleman about the Scottish contacts that he has had.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I join the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) on his excellent Bill. It has been drafted with the care which has characterised my hon. Friend's parliamentary career. It came as no surprise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, just as it came as no surprise to the Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household, that the Committee stage of the Bill began at 10.30 am and lasted for less than half an hour. The Committee rose at 10.42 am on 28 February. That is one of the shortest Committee stages in the history of this place.

Mr. John Marshall: In view of the subject we are discussing, should that fact not be entered in "The Guinness Book of Records"?

Mr. Gow: I said that it was one of the shortest Committee stages in the records of this place. The conclusion I drew from that was that the Standing Committee, composed of formidable intellects, decided that the Bill should receive not one amendment in Committee. That is a tribute to the draftsmanship of my hon. Friend and the intellect of those who served on the Committee.

I wish to remind my hon. Friends, some of whom are not familiar with these important matters, of the formidable intellects who adorned the Committee. First, my hon. Friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): No doubt this is interesting, but it is a long way from the matters before the House. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The amendments deal with variations on the definition of intoxicating liquor, and I hope that we can get back to that.

Mr. Page: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had the privilege of serving on that Committee, and I have never in this House been called a formidable intellect. I was looking forward to the opportunity of being described as such by my hon. Friend, and I would be grateful if he could be given the chance to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are not debating amendments about the hon. Gentleman's intellect.

Mr. Gow: We are discussing the level of alcohol in drink. Neither my hon. Friend the Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household nor I would claim to be an expert on low-alcohol drinks. From time to time, my hon. Friend the Comptroller has summoned me to his own house for consultations. When I receive a summons from my hon. Friend, I naturally obey and the summonses are always for the hour of noon. At that very moment, my hon. Friend takes bottles from the cupboard. Are those bottles filled with low-alcohol drinks? They are not. Indeed, although I have frequently been my hon. Friend's guest over many years, there has not been one occasion when he has offered me a low-alcohol drink. That may underline the need for the Bill and the validity of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), whose arrival in this place we welcomed, although we deplored the departure of her predecessor.

I want to remind the House of another important event a moment ago, which passed unnoticed even by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery). For a short period of the debate, seated side by side on the Treasury Bench were the Comptroller of the Household and the Treasurer of the Household. I and my hon. Friend the Comptroller know that my hon. Friend the Treasurer —like my hon. Friend who sometimes wears a kilt, the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker)—is a non-drinker, or teetotaller. I do not think that one would describe my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone as a teetotaller.

Miss Widdecombe: Not at all.

Mr. Gow: Although neither my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone nor I am addicted to low-alcohol drinks, we are still entitled to a view on the Bill. I see that my hon. Friend the Comptroller assents to that proposition.

There is merit in amendment No. 8. I shall be listening with the closest attention——

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): My hon. Friend referred to our hon. Friends the Treasurer and the Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household. My hon. Friend the Treasurer would regard amendment No. 8 with grave misgivings, because he regards low alcohol as being as bad as any amount of alcohol. He believes in non-alcohol. If we had been able to debate new clause 2, as well as amendment No. 8, my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone would have had the opportunity to draw a distinction between non-alcohol and low-alcohol. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is not wholly correct when he describes the attitude to the amendment of our hon. Friend the Treasurer. Our hon. Friend would be utterly opposed to the amendment, because it refers to low alcohol, whereas he believes in non-alcoholic drinks.

Mr. Gow: I hope that our hon. Friend the Treasurer will be in his place later this morning.

Mr. Brown: I have seen him.

Mr. Gow: But he was not on the Treasury Bench. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will ask our hon. Friend the Treasurer to come in to clarify the point himself. I shall add only that I have been the recipient of the most generous—not to say munificent—hospitality at the hands not only of my hon. Friend the Comptroller, but of my hon. Friend the Treasurer. You may be rather shocked to hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have received only full alcoholic strength drinks when I have had luncheon or dinner at the house of my hon. Friend the Treasurer. I have even been summoned for cocktails at the agreeable residence of my hon. Friend the Treasurer. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) is not leaving the Chamber, as I was about to refer to him.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): As well as referring to our hon. Friends the Treasurer and the Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household, my hon. Friend referred to our hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker). My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North has had to slip out of the Chamber to take part in a television programme—I do not know whether it is on the Bill—but I can reassure my hon. Friend that he is coming back.

10.15 am

Mr. Sheerman: I have heard the hon. Gentleman make some excellent speeches in this Chamber. However, as I sit listening to his present speech, I wonder quite what the recounting of the munificent, wonderful and abundant hospitality received in various places in and around the House has to do with this serious Bill.

Mr. Gow: This is only the preamble; I shall be coming to more detailed aspects of the Bill later.

One important truth may have escaped even my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department. Today is the anniversary of the birth of his late imperial majesty, Emperor Napoleon III of France. Why do I mention that? [HON. MEMBERS: "Brandy."] That is the point. I do not want to be discourteous to the imperial household of a friendly power, but it is said that the Emperor Napoleon III died as a result of overdoing the brandy. I do not say that the allegation is true. Even the solitary representative of Her Majesty's Opposition, the shadow Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), seems to assent to the proposition that his late majesty may have died of an overdose of brandy. If the Bill had been on the statute book during the lifetime of his late majesty, he might still have been with us.

Mr. John Marshall: I know that Queen Mary died with "Calais" written on her heart. Is my hon. Friend suggesting that, if the Bill had been on the statute book at the time of the reign of Napoleon III, we should have tried to apply it to France? We should have had to have extra-territorial powers, which no British Government have claimed for a long time.

Sir Peter Emery: Even I am not claiming that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) will now seek to address himself to the amendment. He has been speaking for 11 minutes and I doubt whether he has yet referred to the amendment. Will he please do so or resume his seat?

Mr. Gow: You will have studied the text of the amendments with the same care as I have, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that we are discussing the group of amendments Nos. 8, 1, 9, 10, 2, 3, and 4. Some of them have been tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), the parliamentary private secretary to our hon. Friend the Minister for Industry. Those amendments relate to the strength of alcohol and how we should describe the alcoholic strength. I had great sympathy with amendment No. 8, which was moved so ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I want to go back to the point about territoriality and the question whether the Bill applies outside our shores. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is on to an extremely good point here. As I hope to demonstrate in my speech, if I catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there is considerable confusion about the way in which EC directives apply on low alcohol here and in other countries in Europe. It is impossible to divorce the laws that we pass in the House, which affect this country, from the decisions and directives made by the European Community and their effect upon the definition and distribution of low-alcohol drinks, not only here but throughout Europe.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend anticipates a point that I had intended to address later in my speech. I shall be referring to the European Commission. I shall also refer to the former right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks., who used to be Home Secretary and then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, before his regrettable departure from the Treasury Bench. I shall be referring to the Commission, because the amendment would include in the Bill the words

"not exceeding 1009°"—

Hon. Members will note the little nought above the figure—

"and of a strength not exceeding 0·5 per cent."

Those are very important words. I wonder—as does my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton—whether, if we include those words, the Commission in Brussels will apply its mind to the question whether we are acting in accordance with Community law. We do not want to make the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone only to discover that the Commission proposes to overrule us.

Mr. Michael Brown: I had some difficulty with the little nought to which my hon. Friend referred, but my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) tells me that it means specific gravity.

Miss Widdecombe rose——

Mr. Gow: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone.

Miss Widdecombe: The little nought does, indeed, mean specific gravity, and in this case 1009° is 0·5 per cent. and 1016° is to 1·2 per cent.

Mr. Gow: I know that I can rely on my hon. Friend the Treasurer of the Household to instruct me in specific gravity. We warmly welcome the Treasurer, who is already in his weekend attire. For those in the Whips Office, the weekend begins early, while some of us have to man the barricades and do the best we can to understand specific gravity and all sorts of other problems. My hon. Friend the Treasurer will be able to comment later on the extent to which he favours my hon. Friend's amendment.

This is a momentous occasion: we now have the Treasurer and the Comptroller seated side by side, with a Lords Commissioner sitting even closer to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have a kind of Trinity on the Treasury Bench. I shall not lay myself open to the charge of blasphemy by trying to describe their different roles. In the centre is the Treasurer and on either side are his guardians. It is the Treasurer to whom we referred earlier in the debate, and who will continue to feature prominently—because, along with my hon. Friend the Member with the kilt, he opposes the consumption of alcohol. I am sure that both my hon. Friends will be in favour of the amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone made a moving speech. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who has made a journey to Scotland, agreed with my hon. Friend. What we do not know—we all await the answer with some expectation, and my hon. Friend the Member for Gelding——

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Gedling.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling is son to his father. I noted that, during an earlier intervention, my hon. Friend used the word "Ireland". He did not mean that; he meant "Northern Ireland". If I rebuke him it is because his father served as Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department also served at the Northern Ireland Office, did he not?

Mr. John Marshall: He was a PPS.

Mr. Gow: Yes, he was a Parliamentary Private Secretary. We ought not to refer to Ireland. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling knows very well, there was a meeting of the Anglo-Irish Conference yesterday, and this afternoon the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, who has made a journey from Dublin, is to wait on the Prime Minister.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I stand rebuked for using the wrong terminology earlier. Let me offer my hon. Friend this deal: if he will forgive me for describing Northern Ireland inaccurately, I shall forgive him for inaccurately describing my constituency.

Mr. Gow: I apologise to my hon. Friend. I transposed the letters d and l. Perhaps my hon. Friend will table an early-day motion recording my apology.

Mr. John Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, with his customary charm and courtesy. He referred to the Anglo-Irish Conference and the fact that the Prime Minister of Ireland has made a journey from Ireland to the United Kingdom. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is most unfortunate that a number of criminals have not made that journey?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are supposed to be discussing specific amendments that are before the House. I have heard no direct reference to them for the past half hour, and I hope that the House will now address itself to them.

Mr. Gow: I was addressing myself in particular to amendment No. 8, which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone. We have clarified matters so that we now know that the little nought above the figure 1009 refers to specific gravity. The key question is, should we insert the words? My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone wants the words inserted because she wants added protection to be given to teenagers; that was the burden of my hon. Friend's remarks.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow made a short intervention. In his short speech, he made his point more vividly than some people make theirs in longer speeches. I was impressed by the hon. Gentleman's intervention. The problems of under-age drinking and the difficulties in deciding whether a girl is 13 or 18 years old are not confined to Scotland: we have the same problems in Eastbourne, and it is a serious matter. I hope that later the hon. Member for Linlithgow will suggest how we might address ourselves more effectively to that problem.

Mr. Dalyell: Nothing is as likely to persuade hon. Members to make short speeches as the fact that they are responsible for business which could be talked out. If the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is really so well disposed towards me this morning, perhaps he will bear it in mind that the third item on the Order Paper is my important private Member's Bill dealing with certain aspects of the Security Commission. I had hoped that perhaps my Bill might have the hon. Gentleman's blessing.

Mr. Gow: I have no wish to injure the glittering political career of the hon. Member for Linlithgow but I must tell him that I almost called him my hon. Friend, and I really think of him in those terms. I hope that that will not injure his prospects. I am aware—we are all students of these matters—of the business that is before the House. We are now discussing the Licensing (Low Alcohol Drinks) Bill. Incidentally, I tabled an amendment to shorten the title, because the titles of our Bills tend to be too long. I know that one must never ever criticise the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I regret that my amendment was not selected. Perhaps it is no criticism of the Chair to express one's regret.

I want to come back to amendment No. 8. Other amendments are grouped with it, but it deals with the key issue. Do we change the wording of the Bill? If we do, will that help to protect young people who are led astray in the way that my hon. Friend described?

There is real merit in amendment No. 8. Whether my hon. Friend will press it to a Division I do not know. I assume that, after contributions from others of my hon. Friends—I do not think that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) can speak again—we shall all listen with bated breath to the first of today's speeches by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), because he will advise the House whether to accept the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone. If my hon. Friend should advise against her amendment, I do not know whether she will press it to a Division. Only time will tell.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone will press her amendment to a Division. We could even vote on amendments Nos. 1, 9, 10, 2, 3 and 4, some of which stand in the name of the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Under-Secretary of State.

10.30 am

Mr. Michael Brown: Can I advise my hon. Friend that, were my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone to press her amendment to a Division, I would most emphatically oppose it? I would recommend to the House and urge upon my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, the sponsor of the Bill, support for my amendment No. 1 instead.

If, during the course of the day, I should catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall urge upon the House the merits of amendment No. 1, rather than amendment No. 8, which is an alternative to that amendment.

Mr. Gow: The House is a little puzzled by some of the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, because they do not make reference to the specific gravity problem.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I am grateful that my hon. Friend has given way a third time. Further to the comments by the parliamentary private secretary to the Minister for Industry, were the amendments to be put to a vote I would also emphatically, although apologetically, oppose the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone, and would urge the House to support my amendment No. 10 which, if I am fortunate enough to catch your eye Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall seek to suggest to the House is worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. Gow: My hon. Friend has overlooked an important point. His amendment does not address the question of specific gravity either. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone was kind enough to explain to me what that little nought meant. At least I admitted to my ignorance on that matter. Of course, my hon. Friend the Comptroller is an expert in specific gravity—I am told that he wrote a treatise on the subject—so there was no need to give such information to him. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, knew at once what that little nought meant. It was only I who was unable to follow it. It perplexes me why none of the other amendments refer to specific gravity. The scholarship of my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone made her refer to specific gravity in her amendment; that is why, despite interventions by some of my hon. Friends, I prefer Maidstone to Brigg.

Mr. John Marshall: Surely it is not surprising that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone is so expert in these matters. After all, Maidstone is in the centre of Kent, which is the hop-growing county of England. Therefore one would expect representatives from a hop-growing county, including my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have a duty to the House and to all those other hon. Members who are awaiting an opportunity to present and argue the case for their Bills. Twenty more Bills are waiting to be dealt with, and I hope that hon. Members will have some sense of their responsibility and obligation towards the other hon. Members who are waiting for the House to deal with their Bills.

Mr. Gow: In view of that advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall resume my seat.

Mr. Michael Brown: As I said in an earlier intervention, I tabled amendment No. 1 before the Easter recess and I should like to recommend consideration of it. Since I tabled it I have been in correspondence with Guinness plc regarding the amendment. The manager of public affairs, Mr. Mark Leverton, wrote to me as follows:

> "I have been sitting on your Christmas card for months . . . I have heard about your promotion from the Back

[Mr. Michael Brown]

> Benches. . . I would like to take this opportunity to point out that we seem to have common interests in the Licensing (Low Alcohol Drinks) Bill. I see that you have tabled various amendments at the report stage and it might be of interest and advantage for you to know that over the last 12 months Guinness has been trying to persuade the Home Office" and subsequently my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery)

> "that 0·5 per cent. is too high as a definition of intoxicating liquor for the purposes of sale in unlicensed outlets. We have not of course been successful."

Miss Widdecombe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so early in his speech. I want to refer to what he has just said about 0·5 per cent., because I was sorry not to have the opportunity to respond to the last issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) on specific gravity. I would like the House to address, I was about to say the gravity of this issue, but that is not quite what I had in mind. It is a most important matter. The specific gravity refers to what happens in the process of producing the alcohol, and that is ignored in amendment No. 1. Under my proposal, if, in the process of making the alcohol, specific gravity rises to higher than 1009 degrees, it is very intoxicating. My amendment tries to link the final product with the process so that there is no stage at which highly intoxicating liquor is produced as a by-product. Does my hon. Friend intend to address the important problem of degrees of specific gravity?

Mr. Brown: Yes, and it is for that reason that my hon. Friend's amendment is unnecessary. Were we to pass amendment No. 8 it would have no effect on the Bill, as it seeks only to define; but amendment No. 1 seeks to change the Bill. In line 11 of the Bill we see the figure 0·5 per cent. by volume of alcohol. I wish to delete 0·5 per cent. and insert 0·05 per cent. Therefore, my amendment will have a major effect on the Bill.

I have a suspicion that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) will be unable to accept my amendment at this stage. However I hope that he may be more favourably disposed by the time I have finished my speech.

I have known Mr. Mark Leverton for many years. I sent a Christmas card to him and received one from him. He is the manager of the public affairs department at Guinness and in the last sentence of the third paragraph of his letter he said, in relation to his efforts to persuade the Home Office and my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton:

> "We have not of course been successful and I note that one of your amendments relates to this point. In view of this I am attaching a note which I have prepared which I hope will be helpful to the debate on 20 April . . . I should also point out that we were put on the spot"—

by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton—

> "who accepted our concern, in general terms."

My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is a reasonable man. I find it reassuring to know that he has addressed the concerns expressed by Guinness about my amendment. However, at the end of the day my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton chose to ignore those concerns. He wrote 0·5 per cent., not 0·05 per cent., into his Bill.

It is fair to say that Guinness would be happy with half a loaf if it cannot have the whole loaf. I have no doubt that Guinness would prefer to see the Bill enacted rather than for it to fail. However, Guinness has made it clear that it would prefer 0·05 per cent. rather than 0·5 per cent. in clause 1. Mr. Leverton continues in his letter:

> "Naturally we chose the former"—

that is, 0·05 per cent.—

> "but we were not particularly happy about it.
> You may also know that definitions of 'alcohol free' and 'low alcohol' are under some threat from Brussels, which is likely to complicate matters."

Although I make no criticism of the Chair's selection, I had hoped that we could have addressed the issue of alcohol free and low alcohol as distinct from non-alcoholic and separate from de-alcoholised. We could have considered that under new clause 2. However, I believe that in the context of amendment No. 1 it is relevant for the House to consider the distinction between low-alcohol and non-alcoholic drinks because my amendment seeks to bring us closer to the non-alcoholic position.

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend has come to the nub of the difference. In introducing the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) is trying to introduce a practical aspect rather than a theoretical one. In response to an intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) said that there was something in existing law like a 3:1 ratio of the amount of drink one must consume to reach a specific alcohol level. That is highly dangerous and could be confusing. The Bill as presently drafted reduces that figure to the extent that if a man went into a pub he would have to drink about 15 pints of low-alcohol beer at 0·5 per cent. to reach the same alcohol level.

I suggest that amendment No. 1 moves us into the realms of—dare I say it—the ridiculous. A man would have to drink 150 pints of beer at the low alcohol level suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) in amendment No. 1 to have the same practical effect. Surely we are concerned with practice rather than theory.

Mr. Brown: Clearly my hon. Friend has not studied the issue seriously. Guinness, as a responsible company, would not have invited me to table amendment No. 1 and offered me its full support if it believed that this was just an esoteric or theoretical discussion. My hon. Friend has not had an opportunity to read the study carried out by Professor Li Wan Po, whom we all know is at the department of pharmacy at Queen's university, Belfast. He has studied the effects on the human body of the consumption of quantities of alcohol at 0·5 per cent. by volume. I am sure that my hon. Friend will realise that his comments were completely untrue. I will show that it is possible to get very drunk, very quickly by consuming relatively low volumes of alcohol in so-called low-alcohol beer.

I have very grave misgivings about low-alcohol beer. Like the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household, I believe that if we are to talk about low-alcohol beer, we should be honest and talk about non-alcoholic beer. I will consider the non-alcoholic beer products that are threatened by the Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: Guinness has also corresponded with other hon. Members. Those of us who want to get this point right want to be clear about the issue without talking about the Government Whips Office ad nauseam.

I believe that the Guinness case is as follows; someone may believe that he can normally drink one and a half pints of beer and still drive safely. That is something that many of our citizens still believe. If that person then switches to low-alcohol beer at 0·5 per cent., he can quickly become a drunk driver. If he were to switch to 0·05 per cent. beer, that danger would not exist. That is the crunch. I have been waiting with great interest to hear what the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) has to say about that.

10.45 am

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has hit the nail on the head. That is precisely why I tabled the amendment.

A very serious point is at issue here. I believe that no motorist should consume alcohol before sitting at the wheel of a car. However, for better or for worse, legislation has permitted a motorist to consume a certain amount of alcohol to a level beyond which it is illegal for a motorist to climb into his car and drive it away. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has outlined the problem about which Guinness is concerned and which prompted its support for my amendment.

It is possible for someone to go into a public house and consume up to two and a half pints of beer of full, normal alcoholic strength and then decide that he is near to the limit. He may then decide to change from beer of full alcoholic strength to low-alcohol beer. As I shall show in a moment from studies carried out by Professor Li Wan Po, it is possible for someone to switch to low-alcohol beer at 0·5 per cent. by volume as recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton in clause 1 and then climb into his car under the impression that he was driving safely within the limit. It is likely that that person would be over the limit and would fail a breathalyser test.

Although my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) made a persuasive speech, I believe that we should reject amendment No. 8 and consider amendment No. 1.

Mr. Waller: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Brown: I will give way in a moment.

There is an industry concern. Companies like Guinness have successfully developed and marketed non-alcholic beers and drinks. I believe that that is the route that we should follow if we want to reduce the consumption of alcohol.

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend spoke about the risks inherent when someone who intends to drive changes from a full-strength to a low-alcohol beer. We live in an imperfect world; is it not possible that an individual who was planning to drive would be prepared to transfer to a beer containing little alcohol at some point in the evening, but, if faced with the choice of transferring to a beer with negligible alcohol—as my hon. Friend proposes—might stick to the full-strength beer with which he started? It is not as simple as my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Brown: I think it is. Let me cite a product that I have had the opportunity of consuming with great pleasure. Kaliber is a beverage that contains not negligible amounts of alcohol but no alcohol whatever. We should be encouraging such products, but they have not been as successful in the past as I hope that they will be in the future because our legislation militates against their production. The taxation policy in our budgetary legislation has given a strong steer to consumers to buy unleaded petrol. Similarly, our taxation policy and any reforms that we make to the Licensing Act 1964 today should always err on the side of non-alcoholic beers rather than favouring alcoholic beers, whether of full, medium or low strength.

A Mr. Lisscomb, managing director of Guinness Brewing GB, sent a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton—and may have sent it to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and a number of my other hon. Friends who are taking part in the debate. The letter, which concerns my amendment, talks about the consequences of the existing legislation, which > "limits the availability of 'low alcohol' and 'alcohol-free' beers by making them available only in licensed premises. Section 201(1) of the Licensing Act 1964"

—which this Bill seeks to amend—

> "stipulates that: any drink that has an alcoholic strength of 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume or more must be sold through licensed premises.
> Moreover, any drink of less than that strength, but which was stronger at any time during its manufacture, must also be sold through licensed premises."

I accept that that is what my hon. Friend's Bill rightly seeks to change. I do not criticise what he is seeking to do with regard to the selling of low-alcohol beers in unlicensed premises; that is not the concern of my amendment, although it is the concern of his Bill.

The letter continues:

> "These criteria were formulated well before there was any demand or adequate technology to produce 'low alcohol' or 'alcohol-free' beers."

The debate on the Licensing Act 1964 was the last occasion on which we had the opportunity of considering this issue at some length, and with a certain amount of serious discussion on both sides of the House. That Act now guides the sale of alcohol in licensed or unlicensed premises; it has been on the statute book for 26 years. The amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton to it is the first of any significance that makes some reference to the new beers that were not on the market when the 1964 Act was framed.

In those days we were a nation without speed limits and without the breathalyser. Those of my hon. Friends who have been successful in the ballot for private Members' Bills have sensibly decided, now that the breathalyser puts so much pressure on the motorist, that it is proper for us to amend the 1964 Act.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He referred to Kaliber; does he agree that it is partly because of its success that we have reached a different phase in the market, and low alcoholic and non-alcohol beers are now being marketed heavily for reasons other than those connected with drink-driving?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is probably right. The current position has resulted not only from the drink-driving legislation, but from the fact that today we are far more aware of the evils—including the social evils—of alcohol than we were in 1964; the greater concern that the public now have for their health; and the government's policy on preventive medicine. There has been a general and voluntary move away from alcohols of full strength to alcohols of low strength and non-alcoholic beers. It is generally acknowledged that there is much greater public demand arising naturally, notwithstanding the drink-driving legislation. I am prepared to concede my hon. Friend's point: we may agree on one point, although we disagree about the various reasons.

[Mr. Brown]

There is now the public demand and adequate technology to produce low-alcohol or alcohol-free beers and the past few years have seen the emergence of such beers. To be brief, I will use the jargon of the trade and refer to NABs, non-alcoholic beers, and LABs, low-alcoholic beers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) said, the consumer demand for such beers is growing rapidly.

NABs and LABs, the letter says,

> "are important alternatives to the usual range of alcoholic drinks and give the consumer greater choice. They are particularly important in the context of the Government's strategy against alcohol abuse".

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will confirm that the Home Office accepts the anomalies that have been outlined by me, and by Guinness. It may not be possible for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to give me the information today—he may prefer to write to me—but I would like to know whether the ministerial group on alcohol misuse—I forget who chairs it now that my right hon. Friend the former Patronage Secretary has been transferred to the Department of Energy, but it involves several Government Departments—has had an opportunity to consider the Bill and my amendment. My amendment would certainly be in line with the group's concerns.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): The ministerial group has welcomed the Bill as it stands.

Mr. Brown: I welcome that only as far as it goes. I would have expected my hon. Friend to go one stage further and say that the Committee would also welcome amendment No. 1 which goes in the direction of the objectives that the Committee has set itself. Nevertheless, I am glad to have my hon. Friend's assurance that at least that committtee has considered the Bill. It contains an anomaly. We are concerned that the Bill redefines intoxicating liquor as having no more than 0·5 per cent. alcohol. We have been talking about 0·5 per cent. alcohol and about the alternative measurement of specific gravity. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne reprimanded me for not being precise in my amendment.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is now 11 o'clock. May I ask whether you have had any request from Ministers for a statement on the alleged pressure on Customs from Government Departments not to prosecute firms in relation to the Iraqi gun export order? I have raised this matter with the responsible Treasury Minister, and he knows about it. Has there been any request for urgent clarification of the authority given to the Ministry of Defence press office to suggest that the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller) was less than clear in his warnings?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have not received any request for permission to make a statement to be made to the House.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask whether from now on—this is a matter of some importance—Members of Parliament giving warnings to Governments have to do it in——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot say to the House what he might have had the opportunity to say following a statement.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Has there been any request for a statement on when Ministry of Defence Ministers first knew about this matter? The question that I put last Wednesday——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have told the hon. Gentleman that I have not received any request for permission to make a statement of any kind whatsoever to the House.

Mr. John Marshall: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was somewhat saddened to hear you say that, because I was wondering whether you had received any request to make a statement on the ever-worsening situation in Lithuania, which is a cause of——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have told the House that I have not received any request for permission to make a statement of any kind whatsoever. Perhaps we can now get back to the business before the House.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought that I had made it clear that I have dealt with it.

Mr. Dalyell: It was suggested that one Government Department, the Department of Trade and Industry, is pointing a finger at another Government Department——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must realise that, if I allow him to make those comments, in all fairness I must allow other hon. Members to make comments on the same matter. I cannot allow that. We are debating a private Member's Bill. I call Mr. Brown.

Mr. Michael Brown: As I was saying, the Bill redefines intoxicating liquor as having more than 0·5 per cent. alcohol. I was upbraided earlier for some lax draftsmanship in my amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne said that amendment No. 8 defines the terminology in terms of specific gravity. I used the term "0·5 per cent." We are talking about 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume. I concede that I should have defined the term in my amendment. I assume that anybody taking a serious interest in the Bill—including my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne—would have readily understood that the alternative way of measuring alcohol is commonly referred to as 0·5 per cent. alcohol, and we normally understand that to mean alcohol by volume. I accept my hon. Friend's apologies.

If it is possible in the House of Lords, should my amendment be accepted, and should it be necessary for drafting purposes to redefine it, I should be willing to accept, perhaps, the addition of the words "by volume". I should have thought that it is such a small drafting amendment that if the other place were pleased to grant a Second Reading to the Bill it would be quite possible to add the words "by volume" to my amendment. I am prepared to accept my hon. Friend's injunction, but I am surprised that he, of all people—he is normally very precise in his use of language—did not recognise that I should have added those two words.

Drinks with a strength of 0·5 per cent. by volume or less would be able to be sold in unlicensed premises.

Sir Peter Emery: If my hon. Friend looks at the definition in the principal Act, he will see that his point is not necessary, because there is the use of percentages in the original Act, and it is made clear that it is by volume of alcohol within the totality of that being tested. There is no difficulty, and my hon. Friend's amendment would be in order.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton for his help. I am seeking to amend my hon. Friend's Bill, which would amend an Act that is already on the statute book. That Act is the reference point for him and, therefore, the ultimate reference point for me. I accept my hon. Friend's case.

There is a strong case for redefining intoxicating liquor at 0·05 per cent., not 0·5 per cent.

Mr. Page: I suggested earlier that we are dealing with practicalities rather than theories. With respect, my hon. Friend is confusing a marketing policy for no-alcohol beers and full-strength beers, and not considering the practicalities of the amendment to the licensing laws. I hope that we shall hear about the immortal research by Professor Po to see how dangerous is the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) as against the theory being advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Brown: I am delighted to advise my hon. Friend that, if only he will be patient, all will be revealed. I have in my hand, and the Minister has in his file, several pieces of paper; they are the study that was carried out by Professor Po. If my hon. Friend will be patient, he will see that I am not talking theoretical nonsense. I am talking practicalities. My hon. Friend continues to be muddled. I am anxious to get us away from low-alcohol beers. I regard them in the same way as my hon. Friend the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household would regard them. They contain alcohol; they are alcoholic. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone that if the Bill is passed unamended it will be possible for a child to purchase low-alcohol beers from unlicensed premises. I am not sure whether that child would be breaking the law. I have a suspicion that, if the child were breaking the law, the supermarket sales girl at the cash checkout would be unaware whether the law is being broken.

Hon. Members must realise that I am seeking to put low-alcohol beers on one side. They are a dangerous commodity. For the reasons that the hon. Member for Huddersfield outlined in his intervention from the Opposition Front Bench, it is possible for low-alcohol beers to contribute to people committing a motoring offence, albeit unwittingly. Therefore, I should prefer that the House accept my amendment. It would then be absolutely clear that there is no danger whatever.

The current definition of intoxicating liquor excludes products which at any time in the process exceeded approximately 1·2 per cent. by volume. All are agreed—certainly my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton agrees—that that is a nonsense. Low-alcohol and no-alcohol beers are normally made by evaporating the alcohol from normal strength beers. The move to define the strength at the point of sale is welcomed by all.

At 7.45 this morning, when my clock radio alarm woke me, I heard the dulcet tones of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton coming through loud and clear. He was challenged by the interviewer, Sue MacGregor on the "Today" programme, on the attitude of the brewing industry. He reassured her, the nation and me—4 million people heard him—that the move to define the strength at the point of sale is welcomed by the industry.

Sir Peter Emery: As is my Bill.

Mr. Brown: As is the Bill. On that point, the Bill is welcome unamended.

However, my hon. Friend and I part company on whether the definition of intoxicating liquor at retail should be left at 1·2 per cent. or put at some lower figure. Some of my hon. Friends have challenged me about the matter, but 1·2 per cent. is quite high. There seems to be general agreement that the figure should be lower. The case for putting it at 0·05 per cent., as in my amendment No. 1, rather than 0·5 per cent., is based on the following three reasons that I can think of. You may be able to think of 33 reasons, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne may be able to think of 333 reasons. However, there are three good reasons that should command the full support of the House.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood said, consumer demand can be met by current technology for beers of 0·05 per cent. alcohol or less. It has been suggested—I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone has returned—that even at no-alcohol levels, and certainly at low-alcohol levels, alcohol must be made from full-strength alcohol and a dilution process then takes place. However, the technology that now exists has proved successful in manufacturing no-alcohol and low-alcohol beers at 0·05 per cent. alcohol by volume. Those tests have been successful to the extent that no-alcohol and low-alcohol beers below 0·05 per cent. now have a 30 per cent. share of the market. Both the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton may challenge me on whether it is technically feasible to manufacture low-alcohol beers at less than 0·05 per cent.

11.15 am

When I took my amendment to the Public Bill Office, the Clerks were at first disinclined to accept it on the grounds that Mr. Speaker would not select it because low-alcohol beer could not be made at 0·05 per cent. Like me, they did their researches, as they always do. We are well served by all who work in the Public Bill Office. One cannot bounce them into anything, because they are experts and they are never wrong. On this ocasion they were not wrong. They did their research and noted, as I have noted, that 30 per cent. of the market for no-alcohol and low-alcohol beers is accounted for by beers of a strength of 0·05 per cent. alcohol by volume which are on sale and available. Therefore, my amendment was not only tabled but selected by Mr. Speaker.

We have proof positive that if, in the early stages, there is any element of doubt in the Public Bill Office about an amendment, it will get its facts right before recommending to the House an amendment that cannot be anything but in order.

There is no technical reason for stopping, as my hon. Friend wishes to do, at 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume. To bring it down to 0·05 per cent. would remove all danger of anyone becoming intoxicated from low-alcohol beer. I forget which of my hon. Friends said in an intervention that one would have to drink vast quantities—pints and pints or gallons and gallons—of beer at 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume before one could become intoxicated. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne would say, I beg to be in respectful disagreement with my hon. Friend.

It seems sensible to avoid the danger of intoxication from the sale of low-alcohol beer from unlicensed premises. I shall use as evidence for my remarks the report to which I have already referred by Professor Po at Queen's university, Belfast. I shall refer to it in a moment.

Mr. John Marshall: My hon. Friend has referred more than once to that learned report. He said that he had sent it to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, or that it found its way to him. Did he send a copy to my hon. Friend the Treasurer of the Household, who has a deep interest in these matters? As it is from a professor in Northern Ireland, did he also send a copy to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who also has a deep interest in these matters?

Mr. Brown: I did not send the report to my hon. Friend the Minister. Ably briefed as ever, and suspecting that I might refer to the report, he has a copy on the Front Bench with him. I spoke earlier of the way in which Back Benchers are served in the House. Not only do we have brilliant and accurate advice from the Public Bill Office, but we can be assured that, when a Back Bencher refers to a report that others might regard as obscure but which he regards as eminently important, my hon. Friend the Minister has it available for his reference. I am only sad that he has not learned the lessons of the conclusions of the report, which I shall reveal to the House in a moment.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for giving way. He has cited the report more than twice. Does he have additional copies for me, and my hon. Friends and Opposition Members to peruse before he takes us through it, as I hope he will?

Secondly, will my hon. Friend tell the House a little more about Professor Li Wan Po? If we are to attach great weight to what he has said, we need to know a little more about where he did the treatise and about his experience. I feel sure that that would enable the House to give sufficient regard and weight to his report.

Mr. Brown: If only the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Secretary of State for Energy would be patient, all will be revealed. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are in the Chair when the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes his Budget statement. Before he does so, you always say that copies of the Budget speech and related papers are not to be passed around the Chamber until the Chancellor has sat down. When I have completed my speech, I shall take such copies as are necessary for the hon. Member for Huddersfield, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) and any others——

Mr. John Marshall: What about the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household?

Mr. Brown: I shall come to the Treasurer in a moment. I shall take copies of the report with great pleasure, so that, if any hon. Member doubts what I am saying about my amendment and wishes to challenge me, he or she can do so with all the evidence. Therefore, the answer to the questions of my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling is yes, but when I have sat down.

I am aware that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are the same Mr. Deputy Speaker who is in the Chair on Budget Day and who takes a dim view of papers and copies of reports being circulated while the Chancellor is making his speech. We have to wait until the Chancellor sits down before papers and copies of reports relating to his speech can be circulated in the Chamber. Therefore, once I have concluded my speech, I shall go straight to the photocopying machine and take such copies as are necessary.

Nobody can challenge the evidence of a professor at the University of Belfast——

Mr. John Marshall: Why?

Mr. Brown: Because as my hon. Friends the Members for Eltham and for Eastbourne will testify, that university is probably one of the best institutions of academic learning in the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) has referred to the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household. I have a suspicion that the Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household has read the report and that it was he who sent the report to the Minister. Everything in the report supports all that the Treasurer has said about the dangers of alcohol both in the Chamber and outside the House during the 11 years and two months that he has been a Member.

I said that there were three reasons to support my amendment. So far I have adumbrated two of them, so here is the third. If the level were confined to 0·05 per cent. of alcohol by volume, consumers in unlicensed premises would need to make no judgment about the level of alcohol. That is highly desirable in this already confused area. Consumers have difficulty distinguishing no-alcohol brands from low-alcohol brands, as is clear from some of the interventions made this morning. That is perfectly understandable. We glibly talk about "low-alcohol" and "no-alcohol" drinks, but there is not only confusion in the public mind; there is still greater confusion in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is seeking to clear up that confusion, and I have no complaint with the general tenor of what he is seeking to do.

If the definition of "intoxicating liquor" were pitched at 0·05 per cent., matters would be much simpler. All products with a "low-alcohol" descriptor would be confined to licensed premises and all products with a "non-alcoholic" descriptor would be available in both licensed and unlicensed premises. What could be simpler? The simple test would be, if there is any alcohol in it, it must be sold in licensed premises only; if there is no alcohol in it, it can be sold in unlicensed premises. Surely that is even simpler than the clarification that I fully acknowledge that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is seeking to bring to section 201(1) of the Licensing Act 1964. However, there is still an element of confusion in my hon. Friend's Bill.

Sir Peter Emery: I know that my hon. Friend would not want to use words that might mislead the House, but surely he accepts that some of the products that are marketed as containing 0·05 per cent. alcohol nevertheless contain some alcohol. As they contain the slight 0·05 per cent. of alcohol, my hon. Friend's argument that there is no alcohol in such drinks is misleading, and I am sure that he would not want to mislead the House.

Mr. Brown: I see the point that my hon. Friend is making. I must acknowledge that even non-alcoholic beer may have contained alcohol at, say, one part per million —[Interruption.]—perhaps it is one part per 100 million —but it might be even less than that. Alcohol may have been involved because of the process of manufacture that my hon. Friend has described.

That is where the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South is absolutely correct. One would have to drink a swimming pool full of such a drink before there was any danger of one registering even 1 mm on the breathalyser. If one consumed such a quantity of drinks of 0·05 per cent. alcohol by volume to register that level, one would almost certainly be dead from causes other than alcoholism because one would have had to drink several times one's body weight.

I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton about not misleading the House. I certainly do not want to do that, but I am sure that he will agree that it would be impossible for somebody to become intoxicated in any way—even a seven-year-old—if my amendment were accepted. As I have said, by the time that one started to register as intoxicated on any breathalyser machine, one would almost certainly be dead for other reasons.

Sir Peter Emery: Much of my hon. Friend's argument has been about topping up the extra amount that one would have to drink if one were to be positively breathalysed on leaving a bar. If a person with 79·97 mg of alcohol in his blood per 100 ml leaves a bar and is breathalysed, that person is not considered to have committed an offence. We may deprecate the fact that he has that amount of alcohol in his blood, but he will not have committed an offence. However, if, with a reading of 79·97 mg per 100 ml in his blood, that person then drank something with 0·05 per cent. alcohol by volume, he would be over the top. Therefore, there is no absolute factor to suggest that, even if my hon. Friend's amendment were to be accepted, topping up would be done away with. As much of my hon. Friend's argument rests on that point about topping up, he should admit my argument. I accept that the level that he is proposing is not as great as that which I have proposed, but a level still exists and must be accepted as still existing.

Mr. Sheerman: Before the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) resumes his speech——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have an intervention on an intervention. I call Mr. Brown.

Mr. Brown: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) in a moment. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is technically correct, but it is impossible to measure the degree of accuracy to which he has referred on any breathalyser machine——

Sir Peter Emery: Is my hon. Friend sure?

Mr. Sheerman rose——

Mr. Brown: Well, I believe that the hon. Member for Huddersfield is sure, at any rate.

Mr. Sheerman: We are not doing full justice to the scientific evidence. It is not just a question of Professor Po's evidence. I have similar evidence from King's college and other universities and institutes, which all points to the fact that it is impossible, in terms of the research carried out on the capacity of the human body, to reach the 79·95 level and then to become over the limit by an alcoholic content of 0·05, although an alcoholic content of 0·5 could put one over the limit. The hon. Gentleman is not doing full justice to his case.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. We should not rely only on Professor Po's research. I have all the other evidence to which the hon. Gentleman has just referred.

Mr. John Marshall: And my hon. Friend is coming to it.

11.30 am

Mr. Brown: Yes, I am. I have also the report of Professor Tipton of the university of Dublin and the report by Dr. Badawy, a top-grade biochemist with the South Glamorgan health authority. The hon. Gentleman's point is also confirmed by Professor Merton Sandler of the postgraduate medical school at the university of London. I have also the policy statement of Professor Timothy Peters, FRCPath. of the King's college school of medicine and dentistry, King's college, London, regarding the top-up question. I shall return to that statement in a moment, but not until I have dealt with the university of Belfast report.

Mr. John Marshall: Much of the discussion has centred on whether taking another drop of alcohol would push someone over the breathalyser limit. Does not my hon. Friend agree that the discussion should centre on whether a person's ability to drive would be impaired? There is a great deal of evidence that the driving of many of those who are below the breathalyser limit is impaired, that they cause unnecessary accidents and that they may cause unnecessary loss of life. That is the real issue, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: But that is not the purpose of the amendments. I hope that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will return to that purpose.

Mr. Brown: You are absolutely right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You were quite right to rule my hon. Friend's intervention wholly out of order. It had nothing whatsoever to do with the amendment, which addresses the top-up question. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has always been concerned about the effect of alcohol on driving. He knows a great deal about the subject. He has demonstrated his expertise and knowledge whenever he has served on Standing Committees that have considered transport Bills.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South had wanted to challenge me, he ought to have questioned me on the top-up policy by referring to the Guinness policy statement on the top-up question.

Mr. Page: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Brown: Before my hon. Friend starts to challenge me on the top-up question, which is wholly in order insofar as it relates to the amendment, I ought to tell him about the top-up question. If the blood alcohol level is 78 mg per 100 ml of blood, one pint—that is, 568 ml—of low-alcohol beer containing 1 per cent. by volume of ethanol, consumed over 20 minutes is almost certain to increase the blood alcohol level of many adult subjects to a value above the legal limit for driving of 80 mg per 100 ml of blood.

[Mr. Brown]

Mr. Page: Who says?

Mr. Brown: Dr. A. Badawy, a top-grade biochemist, says that. He represents South Glamorgan health authority.

Mr. Page: I chide my hon. Friend for the way in which he is presenting his case, but it pains me to do so. Normally, one produces the evidence in scientific matters and draws conclusions. My hon. Friend has been drawing conclusions for a considerable time. I hope that we shall soon hear about the valuable evidence of Professor Po, on which the whole of my hon. Friend's case rests.

Mr. Brown: If I had walked into the Chamber, picked up Professor Po's report and read it, you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would have immediately called me to order and asked what it had to do with the amendment. You would also have ordered me to resume my seat. We have to keep within the rules of order and we have to speak to amendments. If we do not, we are ordered to resume our seats, or we are called to order. An amendment is tabled to do this or to change that, and we have to consider the basis is for wanting to make the change. We have to provide a basis for the argument. Then we use the evidence. It ought to be done my way, or hon. Members would be ordered to resume their seats. We make our case and then introduce evidence to support it when we are challenged by colleagues, as I am being challenged.

I hope to be able to rebut those challenges, at least to the satisfaction of the Chair, as each challenge is put to me, by revealing my evidence. The Minister is in possession of all the evidence that I have in my hand. I am not making up these names. Every piece of paper that I possess is also possessed by the Minister and can be found in his files. He has the report by Dr. Badawy of South Glamorgan health authority. He also has the report on the Guinness policy statement on the top-up question from Dr. Timothy Peters and also the report from Dublin university by Professor Tipton, who is the head of the department of biochemistry at Trinity college. If my hon. Friend does not believe me, I hope that he will believe the Minister when he refers to the evidence.

I said earlier that the House should support my amendment rather than the amendments of my hon. Friends the Members for Maidstone and for Gedling for three reasons. My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling has been absolutely irresponsible in tabling his amendment. According to amendment No. 10, the level of 0·5 per cent. would be deleted and would be replaced by a level of 1·2 per cent. Dr. Badawy, of South Glamorgan health authority provides the evidence on which we should reject my hon. Friend's amendment. Dr. Badawy says that it is possible for someone to consume 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol ethanol over 20 minutes and that in the case of many adults that alone will mean that they are above the legal limit for driving. According to my hon. Friend's amendment, that limit would be raised to 1·2 per cent. He wants people to drive while they are under the influence of alcohol.

My hon. Friend's amendment is irresponsible. I do not believe that he intended it to be irresponsible when he tabled it. It is quite possible that he may catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and rebut the charge that I have levelled at him, but I prefer to use the evidence of Dr. Badawy, a top-grade biochemist, as the basis on which I shall cast my vote if my hon. Friend is irresponsible enough to call a Division on his amendment. I hope that he will not even move the amendment. If he does, I hope that he will not press it to a Division, but if he does that, I urge the House to reject it utterly. The amendment is irresponsible, but my hon. Friend is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, so he cannot be irresponsible, but that is the effect of the amendment. I shall give way to my hon. Friend and I hope that he can account for his amendment.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: My hon. Friend makes an uncharacteristically intemperate attack on my amendment. If I am fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall certainly move amendment No. 10 and I shall demonstrate that, far from being irresponsible, I am seeking to join the rest of the House and act in the spirit of the Bill in making it safer for children and those who drive having consumed modest amounts of drink, by making the definitions clearer. If my hon. Friend stays to hear my brief intervention in the debate, I hope that he will realise that my amendment has the same intention as his, but I am approaching the same common task with a slightly different emphasis.

Mr. Brown: I am sorry, but that will not do. I am seeking to reduce while my hon. Friend is seeking to increase. It is that simple.

Mr. Mitchell: I am seeking to maintain the status quo.

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is wrong. He is not seeking to maintain the status quo. The Bill reduces the limit from 1·2 per cent. to 0·5 per cent. I am proposing that it should be 0·05 per cent. My hon. Friend says that he is in favour of the status quo, but he is in favour of returning to the limit set in 1964, which is not the base from which we should be starting now that there has been a 30 per cent. growth in the market in low-alcohol and non-alcoholic beers.

Mr. Mitchell rose——

Mr. Brown: Does my hon. Friend really want to intervene again after what he has just heard?

Mr. Mitchell: I merely wish to stress that I am seeking to maintain the status quo. The Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) is not yet law, so the status quo is currently 1·2 per cent.

Mr. Brown: Why do we change legislation? Why do we seek to alter the status quo? Because we are not satisfied with the present position. The Government have been in power for 11 years. On 4 May 1979, when the Prime Minister first appeared at the Dispatch Box, she did not say that we had just been elected as a Conservative Government and we were here to maintain the status quo. We are not here to maintain the status quo; we are elected to implement our beliefs and to make changes in legislation. We are here to make improvements. My hon. Friend should not defend the status quo, which is indefensible. Clause 1 of the Bill amends section 201(1) of the Licensing Act 1964. It is a move in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. It rightly amends the status quo that was set in 1964 and that is unacceptable in 1990. It has to be changed for the reasons that several hon. Members, certainly the hon. Member for Huddersfield, have mentioned. The status quo once left us without the breathalyser and without speed limits. We changed the status quo because it was wrong. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will seek to make a case for his amendment, but he has not made a case for it in his interventions so far.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I, too, hope to catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend has quoted a statistic several times. He said that 30 per cent. of the market represents low-alcohol and non-alcoholic beers. The House might find that slightly misleading. Perhaps my hon. Friend can explain what proportion of that 30 per cent. represents low-alcohol beers and what proportion represents non-alcoholic beers.

Mr. Brown: I cannot do that as I should need to take advice from Guinness Brewing G.B., as that was the source of the statistic that I quoted. Unfortunately it did not break down the figures within that 30 per cent. into LABs and NABs.

Mr. Sheerman: I do not want to prolong the hon. Gentleman's speech, which has lasted for more than one hour and 10 minutes, but the letter that I received from Guinness pointed out that its products at 0·05 per cent. alcohol now represent 20 per cent. of the LAB and NAB market.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that information, which answers the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale).

I have set out three reasons why we should accept my amendment in preference to the status quo, to the figure that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton suggests, to the figure chosen by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone in her amendment No. 8 and most certainly in preference to the amendment that my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling seeks to move later this morning.

If the definition of intoxicating liquor were to be struck at 0·5 per cent., there would be three categories: low-alcohol products allowed to be sold in licensed premises only; low-alcohol products allowed to be sold in licensed and unlicensed premises and non-alcoholic products allowed to be sold in licensed and unlicensed premises. In those circumstances it is possible that there would be a move to reclassify 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume as alcohol free to avoid consumer confusion. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton would be the first to say that that would be utterly misleading.

I referred earlier to the note that Guinness Brewing G.B. sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister also received a copy of that letter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Although it seems an awful long time ago, I have heard all this before. I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman is not getting repetitive.

Mr. Brown: You have not heard it all before, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I quoted paragraphs 1 to 4 and I referred to paragraph 5. I referred to the report of Professor Li Wan Po of the department of pharmacy at Queen's university, Belfast. I did not refer to that report in detail; I merely referred to the author, the title and the author's credentials. Most emphatically, I deliberately did not do so because I knew that if I were to read out paragraph 5 of the letter and I then returned to the report, you would probably call me to order, so I took great care not to refer to Professor Po's report in the context of my amendment.

I left out paragraph 5 of the letter, as the record of my speech will show, and with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I must stress that that study showed the following fact to be true. A calculation has been made. If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, think that you have heard this all before I shall stop, but I do not think that you have. The intake of a single bolus—I may have to define that for hon. Members who are not familiar with the term—of one pint or steady drinking of two to three pints per hour of beer containing either 0·5 per cent. by volume of alcohol or 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol—0·2 per cent. by volume of alcohol less than the status quo—increases the blood-alcohol level, whereas the intake of beer containing 0·5 per cent. of alcohol by volume is perfectly safe. Who says that? Not me. Have I said it before this morning? No, because there must be verification of the fact. My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling upbraided me for stating a conclusion without first giving the evidence. To keep myself in order, I have just given the conclusion.

The evidence of Professor Li Wan Po——

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Seventy-seven minutes into his speech, is it in order to move that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) no longer be heard and that we hear the Minister and the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I very much hope that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will take that as a message of resentment about how speeches have been needlessly protracted. I remind the House that more than 20 private Member's Bills are on the Order Paper. At the end of every Session, there are complaints from hon. Members who have been frustrated in their efforts to bring their Bill before the House and make progress. I hope that hon. Members will bear in mind the interests of other hon. Members and my duty to safeguard them.

Mr. Brown: Most certainly, but you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will acknowledge that before the Bill, which was a balloted Bill, is put on the statute book, we should consider its implications. In its present form, the Bill may mislead people outside into believing that by consuming low-alcohol beers, having consumed two and a half pints of full-alcohol beer, they are safe. They may be endangering themselves and others by being over the limit.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I have your guidance? Is there a qualitative difference between balloted Bills and ten-minute Bills a legitimate parliamentary procedure whereby hon. Members have had the sweat of queueing at the Public Bill Office? May I have a ruling on whether balloted Bills are qualitatively more important than and different from ten-minute Bills?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The position is quite clear. All the Bills on the Order Paper have equal status, except in terms of the sequence in which they come before the House.

Miss Widdecombe: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I, more than any other hon. Member, have experienced the frustration of even a second-placed Bill failing because the debate before it was protracted, sometimes deliberately. Many amendments have been tabled to the Bill, which reflects serious interest in it. I have spoken to an amendment about which I feel extremely strongly. I am interested in the points being made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). He is addressing not one, but a series of amendments. If his speech is lengthy, surely it has been in order and surely he is addressing the Bill. As it has precedence, we are entitled to do so.

Mr. Brown: I apologise for detaining the House, but I remember that when the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone was before the House there were 30 or 40 Bills following it. We debated the Bill until 2.30 pm, but it did not proceed beyond the first amendment. I do not remember hon. Members expressing much concern about that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The concern that was expressed to the Chair on that occasion prompted my remarks this morning. I hope that the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) will bear in mind her resentment of how some hon. Members treated her Bill when considering the rights and interests of other hon. Members. Let us get on.

Mr. Brown: I shall deal now with the report from Queen's university, Belfast, but I do not know how to do so. Should I read out the facts or the summary? From what you have said, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will be satisfied —if you are satisfied, other hon. Members will be—if I simply paraphrase it.

Theoretical modelling of alcohol pharmacokinetics in humans was carried out to investigate whether low-alcohol beers could raise blood-alcohol levels to toxic level. A literature search was carried out to obtain the prerequisite parameters for alcohol pharmacokinetics in humans. Data published in studies were pooled and described statistically to provide mean values and variance data. Simulation using those parameters was carried out with the computer packages non-lin and minitab. Non-lin is a general non-linear programme, while minitab is a general statistics package. The conclusions that can be drawn from the current study are:

> "Wide inter-subject variability exists in alcohol elimination from the body. Factors known to alcohol elimination rates and effects include gender, previous exposure, age, genetic variability in enzyme activity and social setting and a blood-alcohol level 800 mg per ml is reduced to half that level in about two and a half hours."

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: These are complex scientific matters. May I emphasise that it would be helpful if hon. Members could have a copy of the research that my hon. Friend is producing?

Mr. Brown: I have been generous in giving way. I have had rather more interventions than I should have liked, but as soon as I sit down I shall photocopy the report and ensure that it is available to hon. Members so that they may challenge what I am saying if they wish. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, thought that you heard me say something before. I am happy to provide you with a copy, and perhaps the Clerk might like one in order to assist you. It is an important report.

Conclusion No. 4 shows that a pint of non-alcoholic beer had a negligible effect on blood levels. A pint of low-alcohol beer may increase the blood level to over 150 mg per litre. That is almost twice the legal limit for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to drive to Doncaster or for me to drive to Cleethorpes.

There can be no doubt that this is a serious amendment that deserves the serious consideration of the House. My comments have been challenged, but I have not relied on my intuition or my statistics and I have not made them up. I have not relied only on the views of Guinness, although it must be acknowledged that it has a vested interest in how the Bill gets on the statute book. I have relied on medical and academic evidence, not just on the report from Queen's university Belfast. I have relied on a host of other medical experts, so I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be the first to agree that I have approached the debate reasonably and responsibly.

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend is at last coming to the evidence on which he has based his case so far. I accept the learned professor's words when he says that if one drinks 0·5 per cent. by volume of alcohol, more alcohol will be put into the blood than if one drinks 0·05 per cent. One does not have to be a professor to reach that conclusion.

Did I hear right? Did my hon. Friend say that the learned professor said that if one drinks one pint of the 0·5 per cent. by volume low-alcohol beer, it could reach levels of 150 per cent. in the blood?

Mr. Brown: Yes, my hon. Friend heard precisely that. He was the one who intervened in my speech earlier to say that someone would have to drink gallons and gallons of low-alcohol beer for it to have a negligible effect. If my hon. Friend wants further evidence, my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton has the very report.

12 noon

Sir Peter Emery: It is 1 per cent., not 0·05 per cent.

Mr. Brown: It is contained in conclusion No. 5 in the report. If my hon. Friend wants me to refer to the evidence, I must turn to page 12. I have a suspicion that while I do not think that I would be out of order, it appears that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, might think that I was out of order if I were to refer to page 12, but my whole case rests on conclusion No. 5, and I think that I would be perfectly in order to draw that to Mr. Deputy Speaker's attention.

I shall turn to conclusion No. 6, on page 13, which states:

> "Drinking non-alcoholic beer at a rate of 1 pint per 20 minutes does not increase alcohol levels beyond 15 mg per millilitre."

There is even more damning evidence in the report, where it states:

> "Drinking low-alcohol beer at a rate of one pint per 20 minutes may raise the blood-alcohol level"—

wait for it—

> "to 800 mg within three hours."

[Interruption.] I thought that that would cause some murmurs and raise the temperature. The report continues:

"Rapid drinking of one pint of de-alcoholised beer when the blood-alcohol level is already at 800 mg per ml, will increase that level to higher levels for half an hour."

Mr. Gale: Really?

Mr. Brown: Yes, but you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I represent northern constituencies. It is not unknown for people in the north, if they do not today, to have drunk such quantities in the past. That is what we are dealing with. I think that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as Member for a constituency not far away from the one that I represent, will agree that we have problems with people who drink such volumes of alcohol.

Mr. Gale: If we get the opportunity to debate this matter further, some of us may wish to refer to the report and demonstrate that it has already been widely debated nationally, and not all its conclusions are as readily accepted as my hon. Friend would seem to say. Does he not accept that anyone who drinks nine pints of beer in three hours might consider that he should not drive anyway?

Mr. Brown: Yes, but if that person was drinking low-alcohol beer, he would say, "Oh, but it is low-alcohol beer. I have drunk nine pints of low-alcohol beer, so I am all right. I shall get in my car and drive away." When the person is breathalysed and the breathalyser goes through the roof and virtually blows up the police car as well as the machine, he will not think so any more.

Much levity is expressed about this issue in certain quarters, but it is serious. Someone may drink nine pints of low-alcohol beer, get into his motor car and think that he is safe from prosecution. Nothing could be further from the truth, as paragraph 8 of the learned professor's report shows.

Mr. John Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. He has suffered from a great deal of injury time this morning. We should not complain about the length of his speech in view of his courtesy in giving way. Does he not agree that some of the advertising of low-alcohol beers is highly misleading? A well-known brand is advertised as 100 per cent. Tennents and 1 per cent. alcohol. Would not anyone reading that advertisement assume that he was quite safe to drink an unlimited supply of Tennents low-alcohol beer?

Mr. Brown: That is the nub of the question. Low-alcohol beer is not safe to drink in vast quantities. The type of person who might be encouraged—because he likes to drink a lot of alcohol in terms of volume—is the type of person who may well be inclined to drink beers such as my hon. Friend mentioned.

The report from the department of pharmacy at Queen's university, Belfast contains another 23 conclusions that support my amendment. I have drawn the attention of the House to only six of those conclusions, and the outrage and shock expressed by my hon. Friends at those conclusions suggests that they will be incapable of coping with any more.

My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is drawing to the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) some of the more incredible facts, supported not only by the department of pharmacy at Queen's university, Belfast, but by the university of Dublin and a number of others.

Therefore, I hope that I have made my case. There are another 20 conclusions that I shall not draw to the attention of the House. I shall photocopy the report and ensure that it is in the hands of my hon. Friends should they wish to catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye. If they want to challenge anything that I have said, I shall happily reply.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak in today's interesting and important debate. I shall try to follow some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), but at less length, because I am conscious that a number of my hon. Friends wish to speak both on this Bill and the next. I see that the proposer of the next Bill is present. It is appropriate that, for a Bill dealing with horses, he should attend on us in his riding gear and apparel.

For the sake of good order, I start by declaring a loose interest in the debate as a shareholder and adviser to a family business in the wine trade. As far as I am aware, no low alcohol drinks are sold in that business, so my comments are not related to that. My constituency contains the Home brewery, an outstanding supplier of ales of all kinds to my constituents and others in the Nottingham area. I have not spoken directly to the company on this issue, although I have meetings with the management on many matters of local concern, and am aware of its views. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and have a chance to give the brewing industry's professional view on many of these matters because that is extremely important.

Every day 40,000 pints of low-alcohol and non-alcoholic drinks are drunk. We are dealing with a growing and important market. That was one reason why I was so surprised that Northern Ireland was excluded from the Bill. Scotland is also excluded from one of the first two clauses. I am grateful for what my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) has already told us informally, and I believe he will say more in his speech.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton on bringing before the House an important matter that needs our attention. I propose my amendment No. 10 as a probing amendment. Before today's debate I was not fully decided about the matter and I shall listen with great interest to the Minister.

There is clear agreement in the House about what we seek to achieve. We want clearer definition and a greater ability to understand the effects of alcoholic drink and to ensure that the consumer is able to understand those effects. I listened with intense care to the peroration of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes. Although he produced a great deal of complicated evidence, he was not successful in persuading the House that we should all adhere to his aim.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton on the way in which he has guided the Bill. He has brought it to the House in a form that is largely acceptable and I make no bones about that. He has also managed to steer it through Committee with little unrest and without disturbing any of the professional lobbies. The only group that has made representations to the House is Guinness plc, and I am sure that we are all grateful to Guinness for giving us its view.

[Mr. Andrew Mitchell]

I have tabled a probing amendment, and I wish to speak about the other amendments in the group, too. Amendment No. 10 seeks to leave out "0·5 per cent." and to insert "1·2 per cent." As we have already established, I wish to maintain the status quo. I shall dwell on a number of aspects, especially the labelling of spirits and beers, and the way in which amendment No. 10 would bring about some rationality in the market which does not exist at present.

My hon. Friend the Minister has already referred briefly to the ministerial group on alcohol misuse, which is more generally and rightly known as the Wakeham committee. Many of us regarded it as an important contribution and we were pleased by the high prominence that the Prime Minister gave to that committee, which sought genuinely to make some inroads into the tragedies caused by alcohol misuse. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to give us a few thoughts on what came out of that committee and on what progress it made.

I also hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will pay tribute to the considerable good work of the working group on alcohol and young people which produced the Masham report. I am sure that we need to hear something on that. In addition, we need a qualitative statement from the Minister about the report to which my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes referred and about the detailed scientific evidence on which he touched. Even now, he is circulating copies of the papers to which he referred.

I am content to leave the decisions on the scientific evidence to the Minister. If the Government support the Bill—I am pleased to see that they do in effect—my hon. Friend will, no doubt, have already considered the weight that should be attached to the evidence. He should be able to give us the benefit of the Government's and his Department's views of the detailed scientific evidence, which is too much for me, a humble Back-Bencher, to weigh in the balance.

One area of concern today has been to find out the precise alcoholic strengths of various drinks and to know how they compare with other alcoholic drinks on sale. I want briefly to shed some light on that. I have managed to persuade the Library to provide some information. In beers generally, the alcohol content varies from 2 per cent. for some of the mild Scandinavian varieties to about 8 per cent. in especially strong beers. Most American beers vary from 4 per cent. to 5 per cent.

The natural, unfortified and dry wines, such as Burgundy, Chianti and Sauternes contain between 8 per cent. and 12 per cent. alcohol and most American varieties contain between 12 per cent. and 14 per cent. Vermouth and aperitif wines usually contain about 18 per cent. Cocktail wines, and dessert and sweet wines, such as sherry, port and moscatel, contain 20 per cent. to 21 per cent. That is the magnitude of the range of wines with which we are comparing low-alcohol beers and it is important for us to be aware of those figures.

It is also extremely important to hear what the Department of Health feels about the Bill and about the alcohol content of the drinks that we are discussing. The central point of my case is that I fear that 0·5 per cent. may be the worst of all worlds. That is a point made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), who has kindly sat through our debate this morning. The tipping-over-the-top effect may be made worse by having a 0·5 per cent. level.

We discussed briefly the importance of specific gravity and whether that was the issue, but I do not believe that it is. It is more important for us to focus on the signals that we send to children who will be able to buy these goods and to people who may drive following a drink and who may be even more confused as a result of the Bill than they would be otherwise. It is helpful for our deliberations to have with us the Minister for Roads and Traffic with whom we so often discuss what he can do to enhance the safety of roads in our constituencies. I am sure that he would have a signal contribution to make, if he were to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on what he considers to be the Bill's likely effects.

I had two major concerns in tabling a probing amendment. It will be difficult for us to pass the Bill unless we are certain of the signals that we send to children and of the effect it may have on those who drive after a modest amount of drink and who want to be clear where they stand. They have no wish to go anywhere near the limit. We must not send them false signals which fail to help them to carry out their perfectly legal and law-abiding aim to have a modest drink and then to be able to drive.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes gave three good reasons for a figure of 0·05 per cent., in respect of which he has tabled an amendment. I do not find the argument as compelling as he did. I am content to leave the analysis to my hon. Friend the Minister who will be able to set our minds at rest. However, it is important to recall that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes made an eloquent and accurate tribute to the Public Bill Office for the way in which it handled the advice on all the amendments which, although closely related, are slightly different. I am sure that all of us join him in that tribute.

I mentioned earlier that the Home brewery, which is now owned by Scottish and Newcastle Breweries, is a distinguished and important business in my constituency. I shall touch briefly on some of the technical problems with 0·05 per cent., the figure that was so eloquently and lengthily supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes. Near beers—that is, beers that are not full strength—are produced with more alcohol than normal. That alcohol is then drawn off to create beers with an alcoholic content of, for example, 0·05 per cent.

The first of my two great concerns is that there may be severe technical problems with the process. I am not an expert, but I understand that the industry has advised that such problems might arise. My other fear is that if most of the alcohol is drawn off, leaving only 0·05 per cent., the resulting taste will not be as attractive or the drinks as palatable as beers containing slightly more alcohol. If we set the limit so low, the product may not prove at all popular and may not sell well, and that will undermine an important aim of the Bill.

Mr. Gale: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The net effect of the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) that we reduce the limit not to 0·5 per cent. but to 0·05 per cent. would be to make many of the products so upalatable that people would choose stronger beers rather than opting for the low-alcohol beers whose consumption the Bill seeks to encourage.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is more knowledgeable than me about the brewing industry. I suspect that he knows more than many of us about the technical aspects of the production and marketing of such products. He has cast some doubt on the first hour of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes and I am sure that the House will be grateful to him for his intervention.

It is perhaps an illustration of the unity that exists on these matters that I can support absolutely one of the points of my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), who said that under the Bill children might learn more easily about alcohol and might learn to consume alcohol. She said that ease of access by children to alcohol and near-alcohol was highly undesirable. She also said that children cannot commute the amount of alcohol that they have consumed. She was worried about alcohol addiction—the habit-forming nature of the product—and mentioned the possible effect of alcohol on brain cells, which is a matter of scientific evidence.

I should like to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton has to say on the subject of children and it would also help to hear the Minister's view, not so much on the health aspects but on matters affecting the Home Office. Under the auspices of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, then the Home Secretary, the Home Office set up a group designed to work to make parents more responsible for the actions of their children as a means of combating juvenile crime and ensuring better parental control. Clearly, the Bill can be seen in that context. I shall find it more difficult to support the Bill if my hon. Friend the Minister cannot tell us that it is likely to make it easier for parents to exercise control over their children. We regard that as fundamental to the credo of our party on law and order, which we wish to see enforced and enhanced. I shall be interested to hear from the Minister what the Home Office thinks.

Hon. Members have argued eloquently about the topping-up effect on drivers. We must be clear of the effect that the drinks will have on drivers and the drivers themselves must be clear of it if the Bill is to have a beneficial effect. Many people were not in favour of the introduction of seat-belt legislation—a cause that I know is near to your heart, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Those who work in the National Health Service have seen the significant effect of that measure in reducing driving accidents. My wife, who worked some years ago in a major hospital close to the M4 and often had to deal with road accidents, is an avid supporter of the measure because it has greatly diminished the frequency with which she had to deal with the sad and tragic results of road accidents. As important as the argument about children is the argument that drivers must be able more easily to see the effects that drinking the products will have. It is important to keep both those considerations at the forefront of our minds.

It has been suggested that six or seven pints of low-alcohol beer could be treated in the same way as six or seven pints of lemonade and that the levels are potentially misleading. There is always the fear that low-alcohol drinks will be regarded as effectively non-alcoholic and that the Bill will serve only to create confusion and diminish responsibility. That was the consideration at the heart of my probing amendment and that was what led me to believe that there was considerable merit in maintaining the status quo.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), I almost regard the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) as my hon. Friend because of his kindness to me on my first day in the House. He emphasised the dangers of encouraging under-age drinking, and I cite his remarks to support my case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne spoke in a style and manner unique to this place and made famous by him. He eloquently supported my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone. He made it clear that he favoured the focusing of attention on specific gravity. I listened carefully and with an open mind and I thought that he put a good case in favour of the House accepting my hon. Friend's amendment rather than mine.

I hope that in his winding-up speech my hon. Friend the Minister will clarify the amounts and their effects. I hope that he will also consider carefully the interests of other Departments in the Bill. It will have an effect on the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, as well as on the EEC, which introduces measures affecting the definition and labelling of low-alcohol drinks. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department and I have suffered a calamity today. When we cannot be in our constituencies we reside in the borough of Islington, where the community charge bills have been delivered this morning. I fear that no amount of alcohol-free lager will be able to mitigate their appalling effects on my hon. Friend and me.

Mr. John Marshall: My hon. Friend referred to the fact that he received his community charge bill——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What has the community charge to do with it? Let us get back to the amendment.

12.30 pm

Mr. Mitchell: I am extremely grateful for your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because my hon. Friend was seeking to guide me down a route which was clearly out of order. I was making the point that whatever amendment, if any, was included in the Bill could not make up for the tremendous size of the community charge bill which I received in the letter box this morning, and on which it would not be appropriate for me to comment further despite my hon. Friend's inducement. Nor would it be appropriate for me to mention that one third of the charge is to finance the special arrangements that the authority made and should not have made.

As the Bill stands, for drinks to be sold legally in unlicensed premises, they will have to contain 0·5 per cent. alcohol at the time of consumption or supply rather than during manufacture. When my hon. Friend sums up, could he advise us and make it quite clear whether the change in the way in which the level of alcohol is calculated has any other significance that we should be aware of? For example, alcohol commuted during fermentation may have a different relationship to the level of alcohol commuted during production. Can he give us advice on the difference between those two at the time of sale?

My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton has been careful to make it clear that the Bill rationalises a position which has previously been confused. We need to know whether eliminating the tests during preparation will have any other effects. Also, if the figure was 1·2 per cent. in 1964, what good reason is there for changing it now?

Amendment No. 1, which would leave out 0·5 per cent. and insert 0·05 per cent., would be too restrictive, and is therefore not compelling. Amendment No. 9 comes close to the amendment standing in my name. It would reduce the figure from 0·5 per cent. to 0·1 per cent. and is similar to amendment No. 1, proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes.

Amendment No. 2 aims to delete all words after "per cent.", but there must be a point of definition, so it would be helpful for us to know the thinking behind that amendment. In amendment No. 3, what does "other conduct in question" mean? That is a relevant point that needs to be explained.

I have already dealt with amendment No. 4, which is important because it would bring Scotland into line with England. Generally, we are in favour of that, particularly in some areas of public spending, where I would strongly favour that.

Mr. John Marshall: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mitchell: I think that my hon. Friend is thinking of the National Health Service—and who can blame him when the Scots can spend 25 per cent. more than we can? However, that is an avenue down which I would not wish to advance, or I would try your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

One effect of the Bill will be to align some of the provisions of the licensing laws on the sale of drinks in unlicensed premises with requirements about the labelling of non-alcoholic and low-alcohol drinks. However, I fear that the Bill, if passed in its original form, may create new anomalies.

As I understand it, the Bill would mean that drinks containing up to 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume would be allowed to be sold in unlicensed premises but that 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume would remain the lower limit for the purposes of excise duty. By deviating from the 1·2 per cent. figure, we will create an additional anomaly: there will be a potential range of drinks between 0·5 per cent. and 1·2 per cent. which will come within the new definition of low alcohol, which may only be consumed on licensed premises but on which no excise duty will be payable. The 0·5 per cent. limit corresponds with the labelling requirements for de-alcoholised wine and beer.

There seems to be a division of opinion about the minimum level of alcohol required for a drink to be intoxicating, and after our discussions today, I am not sure whether any of us are clearer about that. In a consultation document issued in 1988, the Government stated:

> "drinks below 1·2 per cent. alcohol are non-excisable and generally regarded as non-alcoholic . . . there is evidence which suggests that it is not possible to become intoxicated from the consumption of drinks with a strength of up to 1·5 per cent."

What has changed the Government's view since then? No doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will want to address that point.

Later, a concentration of 1·2 per cent. was described as "unlikely to be intoxicating." That statement was made in a press notice from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 8 September 1988.

A consultation letter that appeared on 19 April 1989 stated that low-alcohol lagers can contain 0·9 per cent. It continued:

> "Ministers are concerned to ensure that consumers are not misled into thinking that such drinks are lower in alcohol than they are in reality."

In a debate led by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton on 26 January, there was some discussion about the significance of the 0·5 per cent. threshold in terms of its effects on blood alcohol levels, particularly on drivers who had already been drinking normal strength drinks. It is difficult to know what is meant by the term "non-intoxicating" in that context even when the Government use it.

A cat's cradle of different levels of alcohol is being referred to in different ways by different Departments. There is a danger that that could be misleading. We all know that different amounts of drink affect different people in different ways. A former Opposition Member, Mr. Russell Kerr, was acquitted of a drink-driving charge because he managed to show that something in his gut generated alcohol. That was a most ingenious defence; and it shows that applying absolute levels in the way that the Government have applied them in different press releases can be extremely misleading for people who want to know what they have drunk.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is just talking the Bill out, and he knows it.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) will be able to speak to his Bill later. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton will be successful and also that the next Bill will reach the statute book.

There is bound to be confusion in the labelling of low-alcohol beers. A recent press release from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on labelling controls on low-alcohol beers, stated:

> "This is a rapidly expanding sector of the drinks market. While my colleagues and I believe that existing labelling laws are broadly sufficient to ensure that lower alcohol drinks can easily be distinguished from normal strength products, we think it would be sensible to restrict the use of the term 'low alcohol' to those drinks not exceeding 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume. Such drinks are unlikely to be intoxicating. It is important that the term 'low alcohol' should apply consistently to the whole range of alcoholic drinks if it is to be helpful to consumers."

That is a very definite statement, and we need to know whether the Government's view has changed.

Almost exactly a year ago—on 19 April 1989—a letter from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food outlined a proposal to restrict the use of the description "low-alcohol" and similar terms. The second paragraph of the letter made it absolutely clear that the Ministry wished > "to restrict the use of the description 'Low-alcohol' and similar terms to alcoholic drinks not exceeding 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume."

That is very different from the terminology that is used in the Bill. It is the burden of my amendment, and it is important that we should consider that.

A press release from the Ministry of Agriculture dated 15 May 1989 referred to the strength marking of alcoholic drinks and to

> "New regulations giving consumers details about the alcoholic content of the drinks they buy".

The release goes on:

"The regulations, which were laid before Parliament today, will implement EC legislation making alcoholic strength marking compulsory for prepackaged drinks with an alcoholic strength of more than 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume. The regulations also require strength marking indications to be given for a representative sample of dispensed drinks offered for sale in retail outlets such as public houses, wine bars and restaurants. The requirement for dispensed drinks is subject to a maximum sample size of six for Community-controlled wines and 30 for other alcoholic drinks and the information can be added to existing price boards or wine lists."

The last bit is incomprehensible Eurospeak. However, the first part is clear: it shows that the Government have examined the issue carefully, and reached the conclusion that 1·2 per cent. is the right cut-off level.

Let me complete my brief speech by congratulating——

Mr. Sheerman: Brief?

Mr. Mitchell: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have spoken for much less time than other hon. Members. I am sure that he does not wish to prolong my speech.

On all these points, it is the Minister and the Bill's promoter, my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, who will be able to clarify the different amendments and the effects that they will have. I have tried to put the case for my amendment. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton both on his subject and on the skill with which he has steered the Bill towards its position today. I shall be supporting him. I shall not request a Division on my amendment.

The House and the country owe my hon. Friend a debt for introducing a Bill which—subject to the points on which I seek clarification—will be of great benefit to society, especially in the two or three respects that I have identified.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am privileged to follow the expert speeches of my hon. Friends. Perhaps I can reassure the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) that I do not propose to detain the House for longer than 10 minutes or so.

I will start by declaring that—as stated in the Register of Members' Interests—I have an interest as consultant to the Brewers Society. In that position, I can confirm what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery)—that the Bill is welcomed by the society and by the industry. There is a clear need for the definition that it introduces. It is also welcomed by Alcohol Concern and the Health Education Authority.

Let me refer to some of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) about what has happened in the marketplace. I shall refer specifically to a review in the Brewing Review of January 1990 of low-alcohol and alcohol-free beers. In view of the time, I will not go into the details of the review, but it is worth putting on the record its summary, which points out that, in two years, the market in the United Kingdom for low-alcohol and no-alcohol beers has been transformed. It is the fastest-growing sector of the drinks marketplace, and has accelerated more rapidly than any other drinks type in living memory. There has been a remarkable shift in consumer attitudes. The industry deserves credit for that, because the marketing has undoubtedly improved.

Until 1987 or so, the sales of no-alcohol and low-alcohol beer suffered from a lack of credibility because of the poor perception that many drinkers had of product quality. However, today there is a new scenario. The most important fact is that regular beer drinkers now believe that no-alcohol and low-alcohol beers are a perfectly acceptable choice of drink—and not just when they are driving. That traditional perception has now changed, as is proved by the sales figures, which show year-on-year increases of more than 100 per cent. and more and more brands entering the market.

My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is to be warmly congratulated on bringing forward the Bill and on his expertise and, I hope, on seeing it complete its passage today. Hon. Members will be used to Scottish Members asking, "What about Scotland?" in tones varying from genuine inquiry to artificial outrage. I put myself on the side of the genuine inquirers.

Mr. John Marshall: As always.

12.45 pm

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

However, I should not accuse my hon. Friends of overlooking Scotland. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) visited Scotland recently. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes is renowned for the expertise that he demonstrated on the Standing Committee that considered the Self-Governing Schools Etc. (Scotland) Bill, when he covered many aspects of the history of Scottish education. My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) referred to his recent experience in Scotland.

Unless I have completely misunderstood the position, all the amendments exclude Scotland. They relate only to clause 1. The House should think seriously before passing a Bill that would impose different percentages north and south of the border. Licensing legislation does not need to be uniform throughout the United Kingdom. The Bill does not apply to Northern Ireland. I imagine that that is because of the complexities of Northern Ireland legislation. The Bill would have been much longer if it applied to Northern Ireland. However, clause 2 applies to Scotland, and states:

"from 'an analysis of' to the words '1·2%' there shall be substituted the words 'is of a strength not exceeding 0·5%'."

My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton referred to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. My copy of that Act may be out of date and it does not contain that wording. It refers to degrees of proof and not to 1·2 per cent.

Sir Peter Emery: I wonder whether my hon. Friend has a copy of the amendments to that Act, which was amended in 1971 and 1982 and which I took into account.

Mr. Stewart: I am referring to a copy of the Act, which was reprinted in 1986. I may have misunderstood the position, but the meaning is the same although the wording may be a little different.

With his customary expertise, my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes made an extremely well researched case. Technology is constantly improving. My hon. Friend referred to the Guinness product with 0·05 per cent. alcohol. We should not encourage people to drink to the limit if they are to drive. It is absurd to think that people can work out for themselves whether they are at a level of 78 per cent., 79 per cent. or 80 per cent. My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling put some technical points extremely well. In view of the time, I shall not repeat them.

On Second Reading, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have spotted a misprint in Hansard. It says:

> "The general feeling is that a bear with an alcoholic content of 0·5 per cent."—[Official Report, 26 January 1990; Vol. 165 c. 1243.]

That raises all sorts of visions. The obvious error is that the word should have been "beer".

I make my final point to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes on amendment No. 4. The point behind my hon. Friend's amendment on point of sale is correct. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton will advise the House but I do not believe that in terms of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1987, the amendment is necessary.

Mr. Dalyell: Has the hon. Gentleman had any information—this is a genuine inquiry—from the brewers about their view on the vexed and complex question of points of sale? Have they a view on that point?

Mr. Stewart: Is the hon. Gentleman referring to points of sale in supermarkets?

Mr. Dalyell: Yes.

Mr. Stewart: I am sure that the brewers have a view on any legislation of that nature that comes before the House. That point is referred to in the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, which is currently in another place and will be considered by this House later this Session.

All the amendments would result in the Bill being different north and south of the border. That is undesirable. Therefore, I hope that the House agrees that it would be sensible for the excellent Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton to proceed to another place unamended.

Mr. Sheerman: I shall not detain the House long on this Bill, which I broadly support. Indeed, the majority of Members of the House support it, although, as it is a Friday, they are not here in great numbers.

I wish to make a general point before I mention the matters dealt with in the amendments. The Opposition believe and have believed for a long time that licensing laws are in something of a mess. The Bill will take a small step towards tidying up one corner of that mess. There should be a much broader inquiry into licensing laws and the problems caused by drinking in many communities.

I agree with all the hon. Members who have spoken that under-age drinking is one of the most serious problems for crime prevention in Britain today. Any of us who live anywhere near even a small urban centre know that it is almost dangerous to go into town and city centres on a Friday or Saturday night if one is a"a respectable person" who hopes to keep out of any trouble. The extent of alcoholism and bad behaviour makes many towns and cities almost no-go areas. If the Bill makes a difference to that, we shall certainly support it.

However, there are serious problems with the Bill. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) referred to some of them in his rather long speech. I am sorry that he is not here to hear my comments on his speech. He mentioned the problem of identifying young people when they buy alcohol to drink on the premises or from a shop. The Government must grasp that problem. We must require proof of identity to drink, and to buy alcohol to take away.

We all know that the law on drinking under 18 is widely disregarded by the young and those who sell alcohol, whether in supermarkets, corner shops or public houses.

Mr. Gale: I do not seek to delay the hon. Gentleman, but will he concede that that is perhaps a case for the voluntary identification cards for which many of us have pressed for a long time?

Mr. Sheerman: Personally I am enamoured of such identification cards. If one wants to enforce the law on drinking under 18, it is logical that there must be some way of identifying who is 18. I have never pushed for the drinking laws that are in force in most of the states of the United States of America where one cannot drink legally until one is 21. I have always campaigned vigorously for implementing the law of drinking at 18 which has been widely disregarded. It is about time that we not only implemented it, but offered an alternative to young people. One problem is that there are few institutions, social occasions or social outlets where young people can drink anything other than alcohol. If the Bill provides a basis to ensure that our young people are not pressurised into drinking high concentrations of alcohol in large numbers, it will be welcome.

The Brewers Society and the major brewers have taken a responsible attitude to informing Members about the Bill, but the Government should reconsider the advertising of alcoholic drinks and the way in which the consumption of alcohol is presented to young people. Much of the targeting of under-age drinkers—of 15-plus rather than 18-plus—is irresponsible.

Again, we must present our young people with a choice and with socially congenial places in which they can mix with others of their own age where they do not feel that getting drunk is incumbent upon them. I am afraid that at the moment many young people believe that there is no alternative.

I have already outlined one of the Opposition's worries about the Bill is an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes. I am sure that when the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) speaks, he will be able to put our minds at rest on the point about the evidence relating to the 0·5 per cent. and 0·05 per cent. alcohol by volume. We believe that the Government must reconsider that point and, having listened to the debate, it is clear that although the scientific evidence has come from only one side of the argument, there is cause for concern about the top-up problem. I am sure that that point can be met because I have always believed that if we can take a firm step in the right direction, it is better to take that step than not to take any steps at all.

With that caveat, I reiterate that the debate has pinpointed some of the real problems of alcoholism and the consumption of alcohol and about what it can do to people's social and family life and to young people if they are encouraged to drink much too early in their lives, when they are not educated.

I do not often agree with the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), but she made an excellent point about the need for education about alcohol consumption. Education should teach people to drink sensibly and the lack of such education is all too often at the heart of our concerns about young people. I belong to a generation whose education on this was probably better carried out—and more abruptly. In those days, if someone tried to buy a drink when he was obviously under age, he got short shrift from the landlord who often knew him, his parents and the community as a whole. Unfortunately, that sort of thing does not happen today.

I am glad that the Minister for Roads and Traffic has just come into the Chamber. I have been concerned for many years about drinking and driving. Over the past few years, the low-alcohol option has made a profound difference to drinking and driving. Although I should like other steps to be taken, such as random breath-testing, there is no doubt that the availability of low-alcohol or alcohol-free drinks has made a big difference to the problems for which we must make policy.

We back the Bill warmly and wish it a fair wind. I just hope that the Minister will answer the few questions that have been put to him.

1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I am encouraged by the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). I agree with him that the Bill will help to deal with the problems that worry him. However, it would not be appropriate to discuss them fully at this stage, since we are dealing with amendment No. 8. It will be appropriate, nevertheless, to comment in turn on each of the interesting amendments that are grouped with amendment No. 8.

Amendment No. 8, which was ably moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), would restore in form, but with a different specification for both original gravity and alcohol by volume, the existing definition of intoxicating liquor in section 201(1) of the Licensing Act 1964. Even though the new specification in my hon. Friend's amendment is the same as the one that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) has included in his Bill, I am afraid that I cannot commend her amendment to the House. Nevertheless, I appreciate the concern that my hon. Friend expressed that people may be confused about the level of alcohol in certain drinks. That, however, is a matter to be addressed by the labelling rules. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will give close attention to those rules if, as I hope, the Bill reaches the statute book.

The problem created for the manufacturers and retailers of low-alcohol drinks by the existing definition of intoxicating liquor in the 1964 Act cannot, I am afraid, be overcome simply by tinkering with its references to a drink's original gravity and strength in terms of percentage of alcohol by volume, as my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone would do—as my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) so astutely observed in his first and shorter intervention. More fundamental change, of the kind provided for by clause 1 in the Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton is essential if these problems are to be resolved satisfactorily.

The present definition of intoxicating liquor in the 1964 Act needs to be changed because of the growing numbers of low and no-alcohol beers and wines now coming on to the market. Some of my hon. Friends referred to that problem. Broadly speaking, the Licensing Act 1964 prohibits the retail sale of intoxicating liquor in England and Wales without a justice's licence. It also makes it an offence for a licensee to sell intoxicating liquor to someone under 18 years of age. Intoxicating liquor is defined in the Act as spirits, wine, beer, cider and any other fermented, distilled, or spiritous liquor.

However, the definition goes on to exclude from licensing controls any liquor which is found, on an analysis of a sample thereof, at any time to be of an original gravity not exceeding 1016 deg and of a strength not exceeding 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone would therefore leave the underlying problem as it is.

The interpretation of the law is, of course, a matter for the courts, but in the absence of a ruling from them on the point we have taken the view that this definition brings within the scope of intoxicating liquor a considerable number of the low and no-alcohol drinks now on the market. This is because they are produced, in the main, from full strength brews from which some, or nearly all, of the alcohol is then taken out. Such drinks may, when they are sold, contain less than 1·2 per cent. alcohol.

Some, like Kaliber and Barbican, may even qualify for the term "alcohol-free" because they have an alcoholic strength by volume at point of sale of less than 0·05 per cent., as my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes told us at some length this morning. Nevertheless, the inclusion in the present definition of intoxicating liquor of the reference to an original gravity not exceeding 1016 deg and the words "at any time" mean, we believe, that they must be regarded as intoxicating liquor for licensing purposes.

The existing definition of intoxicating liquor was drawn up before low and no-alcohol drinks were produced and promoted, certainly on the scale that they are now. There must be considerable doubt that it was ever intended to have the effect it has in relation to low and no alcohol drinks.

Mr. John Marshall: My hon. Friend will have heard the comments that clause 3 of the Bill means that it does not apply to Northern Ireland. He is an expert on the constitutional arrangements that affect Northern Ireland. Do the Government intend to move an Order in Council that would make the provisions of the Bill apply to Northern Ireland?

Mr. Lloyd: The Northern Ireland Licensing Act 1971 is not amended by the Bill. It is a transferred matter that should be dealt with by Order in Council as has been the custom since direct rule. If the Bill reaches the statute book, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will be considering sympathetically whether he should bring Northern Ireland legislation into line.

There is, therefore, general agreement that the Bill my hon. Friend, the Member for Honiton, has introduced is a timely and sensible measure, although there were some questions about exactly how he should present it.

One of the fundamental changes my hon. Friend is seeking to make to the definition of intoxicating liquor is to ensure that, in future, the test to be applied when considering whether a liquor licence is required before a particular product can be sold is its alcoholic strength at point of sale—not how strong it once was at some stage in the process of its manufacture.

Such a change would end some of the anomalies to which the present law can give rise—for example, the situation in which some drinks containing between 0·05 per cent. and 1·2 per cent. alcohol at point of sale may be sold without a licence because in the course of their manufacture their original gravities did not exceed 1016 deg and their strengths 1·2 per cent. while others of comparable, or even weaker, strengths at point of sale may not, because when they were being produced, one or both of the limits specified by the law were exceeded.

For that reason, clause 1 of my hon. Friend's Bill seeks in effect to delete from the present definition of intoxicating liquor the references to the original gravity of a drink and the words "at any time". I see my hon. Friend nodding in agreement.

It is essential, if the purpose of clarifying this area of the law and ending the anomalies to which it can at present give rise is to be achieved, that those words no longer appear in that context. The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and spoken to with her characteristic energy would, I regret, reintroduce the offending words into the definition of intoxicating liquor in the 1964 Act and thereby perpetuate the confusion and amomalies that she and the Bill are seeking to remove.

I hope that my reply and the arguments to come of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton will prove sufficient to persuade her to withdraw, if she is still here to do so.

I now turn to the three amendments relating to alcoholic strength thresholds: amendment No. 1 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, amendment No. 9 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and amendment No. 10 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell).

In our consideration of the issue, we have been most concerned to look very closely at what, if the law were to be changed, should be the new threshold—that is the percentage alcohol by volume it would be safe to permit in drinks which could, in future, be sold without a licence. That concern was central to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield. It would mean, for example, that such drinks could be retailed freely from unlicensed premises such as sweet shops, grocers and corner stores.

Mr. Dalyell: I intervene to raise an issue that has been raised in the past by the Scottish Consumer Council which said:

> "Much has been made, in Parliament and elsewhere, of a recent study by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on under age drinking, which suggests that many young people do buy alcohol over the counter in various types of off-licenses. However, that study did not distinguish between small shops"— which the Minister mentioned—

> "and large supermarkets as a source of illegal sales. Amongst 17 year old boys in the survey, twice as many said they bought alcohol from off-licenses as from other types of shops, and evidence from other sources suggested that large national supermarkets were less likely to sell alcohol to minors than some small shops."

It concludes:

> "Despite all that, the government decided earlier this year to back legislation which singled out the larger supermarkets and their customers for attention. That measure failed because of its impracticality. However it seems as though supermarkets and their customers are still in the government's sights."

Will the Minister clarify whether supermarkets are still in the Government's sights?

Mr. Lloyd: I confirm that the problems of under-age drinking are in the Government's sights. The problems are extremely complex, partly for the reasons implied by the hon. Gentleman, such as the variety of sources of drink. I shall not go down that path now, although I have registered the point that the hon. Gentleman made.

The Bill aims to tackle the problems positively and makes available to youth clubs and other organisations where young people congregate the possibility of supplying a range of non-alcoholic or low-alcohol drinks, which they could not otherwise do, with the expectation and hope that at least some of the excessive under-age drinking can be diverted or diminished. It also aims to enable non-alcoholic or low-alcohol drinks to be freely sold in premises that already had justices' licences, such as public houses, hotels, off-licences and supermarkets. We have always recognised that this is a fairly complex question to which there is no simple answer. It seemed to us right that what might be termed the medical considerations should be paramount when deciding the right threshold to adopt.

We therefore sought advice from the Department of Health on the issue. The advice that we received was that the most immediate concern is the short-term intoxicating effect of alcohol on young people. That is not to say that the possibility of long-term health consequences owing to chronic misuse of alcohol was not acknowledged, but rather that the short-term effects of consuming alcohol were considered more important for the purpose of this exercise.

We were advised that the most important short-term physical effect of consuming any alcoholic drink is to produce a rise in blood-alcohol level. The higher the blood-alcohol level, the greater the risk of harm to the individual concerned. No alcoholic beverage can be said to be completely safe; even low-alcohol drinks will produce some rise in blood-alcohol level when consumed.

The eventual level of blood-alcohol achieved will depend upon a variety of factors. First, the concentration of alcohol in the beverage; secondly, how much is drunk and how quickly; thirdly, the body weight of the drinker and whether the person concerned is male or female; fourthly, whether the drink is accompanied by food; fifthly, the extent to which the drinker is accustomed to alcohol; and, sixthly, individual differences in body chemistry.

Setting aside the separate question of whether the consumption of a low-alcohol drink is likely to affect the attitude to alcohol in general of the young person concerned—that was the gist of part of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone—and concentrating simply on the physical effects of consumption, we were advised that it was necessary to take certain steps to make a judgment about the maximum percentage of alcohol which should be permitted in drinks that were to be made freely available from unlicensed premises.

It is first necessary to decide what is the maximum level of blood alcohol which would be regarded as acceptable in a young person. The advice that we were given was that 20 mg of alcohol per 100 ml of blood was an acceptable upper figure in this context. The legal limit for driving is 80 mg per 100 ml—four times as high.

Secondly, sensible, arbitrary assumptions have to be made about the various factors that influence eventual levels of blood alcohol. I said earlier that those must be based on the likely pattern of the social use of low-alcohol beverages by young people. A minority of young people may consume such drinks to get drunk. If that is actually what they are intent on doing, it seems more likely that they will choose full-strength drinks from one or other sources from which they may obtain them.

Mr. Dalyell: Forgive my curiosity and inquisitiveness, but where does that Home Office advice come from? I am sure that it is good, but I was asked from where it came.

1.15 pm

Mr. Lloyd: I had hoped that I had mentioned that. It comes from the Department of Health, the opinion of which will be the distillation of the medical advice it has received which, in turn, will be a distillation of the research and opinions of outside experts. The Home Office bases its advice on those contributions. We do not pretend to be experts on this matter. I would be surprised if there was any substantial expert on the subject whose opinions were not known to the Department and, therefore, had not influenced its opinion.

There is a wide range of opinions on these matters. We have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes about Professor Li Wan Po. Research has also been undertaken by the university at Frankfurt and Charing Cross hospital that suggests that 0·5 per cent. alcohol beer—the upper limit in my hon. Friend's Bill—does not raise blood-alcohol level because the alcohol is metabolised by the body faster than it can be consumed. There is a wide range of opinion among the experts. I am providing a distillation of those opinions by the experts in the Department of Health, rather than representing any one, specific, expert view.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), having spoken for an unconscionable number of minutes, does not do his own Minister the courtesy of at least coming to hear the answer. Such behaviour does the House of Commons no credit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The hon. Gentleman has referred to some of the courtesies of the House. As he knows, they are not matters for the Chair.

Mr. Lloyd: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has been drawn from the Chamber for a few minutes by an important cause.

I shall continue with the assumptions that have to be made when coming to a decision about what constitutes a reasonable threshold in law.

It would be reasonable to assume that the majority of young people will seldom drink more than an average of two pints in one hour, six pints in three hours or eight pints in four hours. The percentage of alcohol by volume it would be safe to permit in drinks which are to be freed from licensing restrictions would then be a figure that would allow a typical young person to consume a reasonable quantity of such drink without exceeding a blood alcohol concentration of 20 mg per 100 ml of blood. Various methods exist to make such a calculation, all of which are approximate. The particular method on which the advice we were given was based uses as an example a young drinker who is a 15-year-old girl, 4ft 6in tall, weighs 5 stones and whose habitual consumption is one pint of 0·5 per cent. alcohol beer per week. That is probably not representative of any hon. Member, except my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone who, I am glad, is in her place.

Drinking 1 per cent. beer, two pints in an hour without food would produce a blood alcohol level of 30 mg per 100 ml. That is above the limit regarded as acceptable and leads me to advise the House against accepting the amendment put down by my hon. Friend, the Member for Gedling, although he made his point persuasively and intelligently. As he said, his is a probing amendment, and I hope that my answer will satisfy him.

Drinking 0·5 per cent. beer, the young girl in this example could consume up to six pints over three hours without any food and still remain within the acceptable blood alcohol level of 20 mg. Of course, the threshold for which my hon. Friend, the Member for Honiton has made provision in his Bill is that very one, of 0·5 per cent. Drinking 0·05 per cent. beer, the one recommended by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, it would be virtually impossible for the young lady to exceed the acceptable limit of 20 mg. Even if she drank 32 pints in one hour, her blood alcohol concentration would still be only 15 mg.

It is clear from all this that the amendments tabled by my hon. Friends the Members for Brigg and Cleethorpes and Hendon, South deserve the most careful consideration by the House. However, on the basis of the medical evidence that we have received at the Home Office, the Government see no compelling reason why the threshold should be set as low as these amendments provide.

Moreover, if the amendments were to be accepted, only a very few alcohol-free beers would be freed from licensing restrictions. Most low-alcohol beers and virtually all de-alcoholised wines would remain subject to the licensing regime. It seems to us, therefore, that in making provision in the Bill for a threshold of 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume, my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton has got it about right. The Bill, as presently drafted, would free from the licensing requirement some 10 or so low-alcohol beers and all de-alcoholised wines. The latter, to qualify for that description under labelling law, must not exceed 0·5 per cent. alcohol by volume, which is the figure used in the Bill.

Amendment No. 2, which has also been tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, seeks to delete the words:

> "at the time of the sale or other conduct in question."

My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, the promotor of the Bill, has chosen to include the words

> "at the time of the sale or other conduct in question"

in the revised definition of intoxicating liquor in section 201(1) of the Licensing Act 1964 for which the Bill provides. I understand my hon. Friend's desire to clear up once and for all the confusion to which the inclusion in the present definition of intoxicating liquor of the words "at any time" has given rise. Intoxicating liquor is there defined as > "spirits, wine, beer . . . cider . . . and any other fermented, distilled or spiritous liquor".

However, the definition goes on to exclude any liquor which is found, on an analysis of a sample thereof at any time, to be of an original gravity not exceeding 1016 deg and of a strength not exceeding 1·2 per cent. alcohol by volume.

The interpretation of the law is a matter for the courts. However, in the absence of a ruling from them on the point, we have taken the view that the inclusion of the present definition and the words "at any time" would serve to bring a considerable number of the low and no-alcohol drinks that would be released on to the market within the scope of that definition. I appreciate what my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes seeks to do, although my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton has advised the House that it would not be desirable to accept amendment No. 2. If we did accept it, I believe that it would probably make little difference to the effectiveness of the Bill.

Amendment No. 4, also tabled by my indefatigable hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes seeks to bring the revised Scottish definition of alcoholic liquor into line with the equivalent English definition by adding the words:

"at the time of the sale or other conduct in question."

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) is not indefatigable enough to come to hear the Minister's answers. That is disreputable and I hope that the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Procedure, has his own thoughts on that.

Mr. Lloyd: Amendment No. 4 would not be as helpful as I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes intended it to be, as the additional words would seriously impair the proper operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. To expand the Scottish definition in that way would render the point of sale or "other conduct in question" as the material time for determining the alcoholic strength of liquor. The amended definition would confuse interpretation and enforcement of Scottish licensing law which, at present, eschews all reference to material or other times. In particular, I am advised that the amendment would handicap the prosecution of various offences under the 1976 Act such as unlicensed trafficking in liquor or under-age consumption of liquor in a bar. I hope that my hon. Friend, if he returns to the Chamber in time, will be persuaded to withdraw the amendment, or at least not to push it to a vote, if that was his previous intention. I hope that I have managed to deal with all the major points in the debate. I hope that the House will accept the Bill as drafted.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Under-Secretary has made a carefully thought-out speech on a subject that is important to a great many people throughout Britain. An unconscionable amount of time was occupied by the hon. Members for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) and for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), yet they did not even have the courtesy to be present to hear what the Minister had to say. I shall leave manners out of this because such behaviour goes beyond manners; it brings great discredit on the House of Commons. I shall write formally to the Chairman of the Procedure Committee to draw his attention to exactly what has happened today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has drawn attention to the normal courtesies of the House, and I am glad that he has done so but as I have already said, this is not a matter over which the Chair has authority.

Mr. Lloyd: On a related point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should explain that my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) approached me courteously before he left to express his regret that he could not be here to hear my response to the debate.

Mr. John Marshall: First, let me join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) on his luck in the ballot and on his good sense in promoting the Bill.

If brevity be the spice of wit, there has been little wit about our proceedings this morning. although we have had some wisdom, some academic learning and a great deal of concern about the impact of alcohol on society. The very fact that we are debating the Bill reflects strongly on social trends over the past 20 years. Twenty years ago, we might even have been laughed out of court because for someone to say then that he would not have a drink because he was driving was regarded as almost effete. Today, the folly of drinking and driving is recognised by virtually everyone. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for his work when he was Minister for Roads and Traffic and to the present incumbent of the post, who is in his place and happy to be listening to our debate today. We are pleased to have my hon. Friend here because he is the true representative of the red rose of England—unlike those politicians who have merely hijacked the red rose for their temporary electoral advantage.

The problems of under-age drinking are of great concern. Several hon. Members have related under-age drinking to the problem of crime. It is a fact that people are most likely to commit crime at the age of 15 or 16. That may well reflect the tedium of the last year at school, but it also reflects the cost and folly of under-age drinking.

The second problem to which I wish to refer briefly is that of drinking and driving. We have had much discussion of whether taking that extra draught of low-alcohol beer might push someone over the limit. It must be said that many people who are well below the breathalyser limit are a menace on the roads because the alcohol that they have consumed has made them less safe drivers than they would otherwise be. Those of us who speak in such terms, do not wish to be killjoys. We merely seek to get rid of unnecessary, unwanted accidents.

As the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said, my hon. Friend the Minister made a moving and wise speech, and in an effort to help the House to make progress I should say that I propose not to press my amendment.

Mr. Gale: I remind the House that I have a properly declared interest in Scottish and Newcastle Breweries. Also some years ago I had the good fortune to train as a counsellor in alcohol-related problems, and I hope that my credentials in the field are not questioned by the House. I have a particular understanding of the problems that alcohol misuse can cause and that understanding is certainly shared by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who spoke on behalf of the Brewers Society, and by members of that society collectively and individually.

Brewers are in the business of providing pleasure and creating the environment in which their products can be enjoyed properly. They have no interest in sending people out of public houses roaring drunk to cause public affray or to climb into cars and cause accidents. That is the worst possible publicity. It is for precisely that reason that the Brewers Society has invested enormous sums of money in education programmes targeted at young people who are certainly at risk. That is also why it has invested many millions of pounds in the development of the products that we have been discussing all morning and that are referred to in the Bill.

1.30 pm

There has been and there remains a major problem with under-age drinking. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) referred to that earlier in the debate. He criticised my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) for leaving the Chamber, but I see that he, too has now left the Chamber.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend has left the Chamber on my behalf with a message and will be back directly.

Mr. Gale: Perhaps sometimes one should look at the beam in one's own eye before criticising the mote in another's. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes has equally pressing business in his constituency. We all understood and seek to observe the courtesies of the House, whether or not the cameras are upon us, and whether or not we wish that our Bills might have been reached.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow referred to the difficulties that publicans face over identification. It is hard for a publican to differentiate in a crowd of people who are 15, 16, 17 or 18.

I was pleased that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) was able to acknowledge the proposal —which some hon. Members been putting forward for some time—that it would be enormously helpful to people running licensed houses, among others, to have available an officially recognised national but voluntary identity card scheme. I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will accept that. It would be better to have one organised, recognised, national scheme rather than a plethora of amateur schemes, but that is not the subject of this debate.

The problems of low-alcohol and non-alcoholic beers have been fully discussed this morning. It is a fact that, as the law stands, until it is changed by the Bill there is an anomaly relating to the production of low-alcohol beers and to the reference in the Bill to "at any time" during the process. That has meant two things: first, that outlets supplying young people have been unable to supply those products; and, secondly, that the legislation has favoured imported products, in which the gravity at the point of sale is known but the alcohol content or gravity reached during production is not known. I can think of one German brand which has benefited—I shall not publicise it by naming it—whereas others produced to an excellent standard in this country have failed.

Considerable technical problems exist in the reduction of alcohol to low and non-alcoholic levels. It is a fact that the flavour of products which contained alcohol during the production process but which are reduced to non-alcoholic standards suffer. For that reason and given the enormous growth in that market to which my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood referred, the major slice of that growth has been in low-alcohol beers rather than in non-alcoholic beers. It would be a tremendous shame if the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) in her excellent speech and amendment No. 1 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes were accepted and the level was reduced to the point that unpalatable products were offered to people who might want to buy low-alcohol beers. They might prefer a better taste and therefore purchase beers with a much higher alcohol level and in that respect I am thinking in particular of the young.

I shall refer to an incident in my constituency, and I am sure that all hon. Members will have had similar experiences. Representatives of the Cabin youth club approached me a couple of years ago with the same problem that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) is seeking to solve with his Bill today.

Those representatives told [illegible] that, by implication, they had many young members under the age of 18 who liked to have a drink. They told me that those young people enjoyed low-alcohol beers and lagers and that Kent county council had told them that they could not supply those drinks because the youth club was not licensed. Because those beers and lagers reached a prohibited limit during their manufacture, although that limit did not apply now, the club could not sell them. I raised the matter with Kent county council and was informed, correctly, that the council was operating the law properly. I was told that my local youth club could not supply the young people with the product that they wanted. The result—something to which my hon. Friend the Minister referred earlier—was that the young people, who were quite happy to mix and meet in that largely non-alcoholic environment, went instead to local pubs because they wanted a pint of beer. The law had precisely the opposite effect to that which we all wanted.

I hope that the amendments will be withdrawn or rejected because I would hate to see a counter-productive measure introduced into what is otherwise an excellent Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton on his Bill. I wish it God speed and I hope that it reaches the statute book very soon.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): As a sponsor of the Bill, I must tell the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that my earlier absence from the Chamber—I was present at the beginning of the debate—occurred because I was carrying out duties that Scots frequently have to carry out on Fridays. I had to do my stint on television and radio and I am sure that the hon. Member for Linlithgow does his share of that. Inevitably that duty required me to leave the Chamber.

As so many hon. Members have said, the Bill will go a long way towards dealing with the ghastly problem facing us today of the young who cannot find a place in which they can have refreshments without infringing the law. Reference was made to the possibility of an identity card system. When I was young, people under the age of 18 were not a problem. Those of us over 18 were usually in uniform and those who were not carried identity cards. There was no problem about access to premises. However, things change.

When I was under 18 I participated in activities where there was no drink. However, the pattern of life has changed. If someone wants to run a disco he cannot do so without a licence if he wants to offer any light refreshment of the low-alcohol strength that the youngsters want.

The problem has grown progressively worse over the years, because—sadly—more and more young people are infringing the law, simply because it has not accommodated the change in our society and the changing pattern of demand. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) is to be congratulated on introducing a Bill to deal with this dreadful problem.

In an earlier intervention I mentioned that we have a problem in Scotland with under-age drinking; it is a common problem throughout the United Kingdom, but I hope that the Bill will go a long way towards resolving it. I hope that my hon. Friend will reject the amendments, because the Bill as it stands is perfectly adequate, and will deal with what my hon. Friend set out to do. I congratulate him, and hope that the Bill has a swift passage.

Sir Peter Emery: It is probably unusual for any hon. Member not to speak to his Bill until four hours and 10 minutes into the debate. Although, in another role, I suggested that speeches should be limited to 10 minutes, perhaps if I go over that limit by a minute or two I shall be forgiven.

What does my Bill set out to do, and how do the amendments affect it? The Bill will establish a considerable limitation on alcohol consumption by under-age people, and that must be welcomed. It also stands an excellent chance of showing that social drinking is possible without people having to consume alcohol. Later I shall discuss the way in which that affects youth clubs and all that goes with them.

A letter from Sir Donald Maitland, chairman of the Health Education Authority, will perhaps say more in support of my Bill than the kind remarks made by my hon. Friends and Opposition Members:

> "At a meeting this afternoon of representatives of the Health Education Authority, Alcohol Concern, the Brewers Society and the Wines and Spirits Association, we agreed to urge you"— that is the Minister—

> "to do all you can to ensure that Parliamentary time is made available to ensure the passage of Sir Peter Emery's Private Member's Bill on the Sale of Low and No Alcohol in Unlicensed Premises."

People have asked who supports the Bill. As that letter shows, the answer is "everyone". That is most unusual —and necessary, if a Bill comes 16th in the ballot.

When I examine the amendments, I feel that much of my job has been done. Sitting here, I felt slightly like a Secretary of State as the Under-Secretary did my job for me in answering so ably. I thank him for his support. Most of the questions were raised in the amendments, so I do not intend to go over many of the points.

My hon Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) made a thoughtful and provoking speech, raising a number of matters. However, the weakness of her amendment—which does little to alter the intention of the Bill—is that it would limit the clarification in the Bill about the production levels and the way of production, so that the judgment made is of alcohol at the point of supply and sale, not of how it has been produced before it is supplied or sold. That is of great importance. I am certain that the producers of low-alcohol drinks feel that that is essential in meeting their ability to supply low-alcohol drinks.

Much of the debate has been about that little extra amount of alcohol that could mean that a person would find himself over the limit and would commit an offence if he drove an automobile. I make it absolutely clear that the Bill has nothing to do with topping up. Hon. Members are trying to ensure a definition of low-alcohol beer. I do not wish to encourage people to drink so that they must question whether they should have another alcoholic drink, a non-alcoholic drink or something else. They should not be at that level and then get behind the wheel of a car.

1.45 pm

The topping-up argument has nothing to do with the Bill. We do not want people to think that because they had just one extra non-alcoholic drink having boozed themselves silly at an earlier time, they can drive a motor vehicle.

I thank the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for his kind remarks in supporting my Bill. He asked me two questions, one of which was about my contact with the Scottish authorities. I have been in touch with the Scottish Office and certain representatives of the trade in Scotland. As the hon. Gentleman will know, my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) are sponsors of the Bill. We tried to ensure that there was full and proper Scottish participation in the presentation of the Bill.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow also asked me about the age problem. That question has been asked elsewhere. The Bill does nothing to solve the purchasing problem, but I hope that it will encourage many more youngsters to believe that there is no need to buy beers or wines. There will now be de-alcoholised beers and non-alcohol beers that will be quite adequate for them.

The only way in which we shall overcome problems with retail outlets is by having identity cards. I support the introduction of national identity cards. We had them during the war and they were all right then. Nearly every other country in Europe has them. The only people who object to identity cards are those who break the law and do not wish to be found out. That subject is not part of the debate, so I shall take it no further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) apologised for the fact that he could not be here because he had another parliamentary commitment. I thank him for his support, although I do not believe that I had to rely on Emperor Napoleon III. My hon. Friend posed an interesting question about specific gravity. We have simplified the matter. We do not need to refer to specific gravity because we do not need to refer to production structure; we need refer only to the percentage of alcohol in liquor at the time of sale. That is a helpful aspect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) said that he would try to wait for my speech, but he had to leave. He asked whether I could answer his questions by letter if he was not here. That is the polite way of dealing with the matter, so of course I shall do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) provided evidence from Guinness Brewing GB. Much of the evidence that he quoted was on drinks with an alcohol content of 1 per cent., not 0·5 per cent. as the Bill sets out. The Minister's case, which was put much better than I could have done, made it clear why we have settled on 0·5 per cent. I wanted a level that was widely accepted throughout the industry. We must consider not only the brewers but the wine, cider and shandy producers. My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes entirely forgot about those products in his argument.

I am afraid that the matter raised by Guinness Brewing GB is a vested interest. If the amendment were carried, the company would be in almost a monopoly position. It alone would be able to provide low-alcohol and no-alcohol drinks and everything else would have to be licensed. That would do us no good in respect of youth clubs or letting the housewife know that children can go to the corner shop and buy any drink, and that it will not contain alcohol that could affect them. It would be wrong to put one brewer in that position, which would be the effect of my hon. Friend's amendment.

The flavour of drinks and their ability to attract people to consume only those drinks would be massively reduced if the amendment were accepted. There would not be the variety of tastes. Certainly, wines and ciders could not be reduced to the level of alcohol in my hon. Friend's amendment. I hope that that will find favour with hon. Members and that they will reject the possibility of proceeding to 0·05 per cent.

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because I have had more than my fair share of time today. Will he reaffirm that, unamended, his Bill will allow a wide range of good British-made products to be made available to the public and in youth clubs?

Sir Peter Emery: Yes, yes and yes again.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) made some helpful and interesting remarks from the Opposition Front Bench. He made several genuine points. Further clarification of the licensing laws is something that we should all like. I have already dealt with under-age drinking. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support from the Front Bench.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) also supported the Bill. He raised a genuine point about the accuracy of some of its wording. I believe that we have got it right, but I shall look at it again to make certain that, before it goes to another place, it is right.

In the hope that we shall not have many more speeches, I believe that the Bill will set a new era for youth clubs and make young people realise that it is not necessary to go to the pub and break the law in order to enjoy a social occasion. They can enjoy social drinking of low-alcohol drinks. Parents can encourage their children to participate in such occasions and Churches, youth club leaders and educationists can sponsor the social activities that my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) mentioned. I hope that I can persuade my hon. Friends not to press any of the amendmets and that we can get on with the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 3

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Miss Widdecombe: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 20 leave out from 'appoint' to end of line 22.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall take amendment No. 11, in page 1, line 21, leave out '30th June 1992' and insert '1st January 1994'.

Miss Widdecombe: I shall not detain the House for long on amendment No. 7 because I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) wishes to speak to his amendment, amendment No. 11, which is a halfway mark between what I wanted to do and what the Bill currently proposes. I am happy to leave the matter in his capable hands instead of pressing my amendment because I am aware that other hon. member wish to speak.

I fully understand the frustrations of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) about what has happened this morning. However, some of us have a solid record of speaking on licensing matters. I do so regularly and felt strongly in principle about the amendment that I moved earlier, although in practice it proved to be wrong. I apologised at the beginning of my speech for the fact that there would be times when I would be absent from the Chamber. I am now happy——

Mr. Dalyell: I acknowledge straightaway that the hon. Lady has shown me absolute courtesy. What I object to is hon. Members making speeches as long as that made by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr Brown) and then not being present to hear the Minister's reply.

Miss Widdecombe: I do not wish to delay the House any longer by arguing the toss on that one. I am happy to withdraw my amendment in favour of that of my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) can speak to his amendment, but if he wishes to pursue it, I shall ask him to move it formally later.

Sir Peter Emery: I have been persuaded to give a longer period to Government before the essential introduction of the Bill and to extend the date from the middle of June 1992 to 31 December 1994.

I am not willing to see the Bill pass through the House only to sit, like some private Members' legislation, on the shelf without being introduced simply because it requires a statutory instrument from the Government. I wanted to ensure that there was a date on which the provisions had to be implemented. I am happy for the Government to introduce the provisions earlier and we have given them the powers so to do through a statutory instrument.

I have been persuaded by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that because of the need to attempt to reach an agreement in the European Economic Community on labelling, and so that the industry would not have to implement two labelling alterations, implementation of the provisions might take longer than the period up to mid-1992. That being the case, it seemed reasonable to accede to the Ministry's request. I thought that another 18 months was long enough for the industry to get its finger out and to get on with the job. I hope that that is agreeable to the Government.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government are grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery). The original provisions allowed insufficient time for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to bring in the necessary labelling changes because they involved EEC regulations. The extra time will be extremely valuable to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton that the Government not only want to see the legislation on the statute book, but want it brought into effect. There will be no delay on the Government's part and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his co-operation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) wishes to withdraw amendment No. 7?

Miss Widdecombe: Yes, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 11, in page 1, line 21, leave out '30th June 1992' and insert '1st January 1994'.—[Sir P. Emery.]

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

1.58 pm

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I shall detain the House for only a moment. While I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) on the great progress that has been made today in bringing this Bill towards the statute book, I should like to comment on the role of the law in backing up the splendid efforts of not only my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic but his predecessor, in encouraging the brewers to produce and market effectively lower-alcohol and non-alcoholic beers and other beverages. Remarkable progress has been made during the past few years. This step, more than any other, has had an effect on drink driving.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that a great virtue of the British system of Government is that this progress has been made voluntarily and by the action of independent interests rather than, as happens in so many countries, by means of statutory regulation?

Mr. Waller: I agree with my hon. Friend. The effect of random breath testing would be minuscule compared with the work that has been done to encourage people to drink beverages that are unlikely to lead them to drive while under the influence of alcohol. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton has backed up that approach by introducing sensible legislation which will work hand-in-hand with the voluntary efforts being made. I congratulate him on promoting the Bill and I look forward to it becoming law.

2 pm

Mr. Dalyell: May I address, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) in two different capacities? First, he should be congratulated on promoting the Bill. However, there is a great lacuna in the House of Commons. We pass legislation, but there is no systematic monitoring of what we have achieved. In a year or so, therefore, it would be interesting if there could be an Adjournment debate on how the proposals have worked out in practice and whether they have led to the strides forward for which some of us hope.

Secondly, the hon. Member is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Procedure. I hope that he will not just go away and forget what has happened today. There are lessons to be drawn from this debate. The Select Committee on Procedure should consider how we go about our business.

2.1 pm

Sir Peter Emery: I very much liked the first suggestion of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I hope that both he and I will be able to consider monitoring not just this Bill but other private Members' Bills to find out whether they have been brought into operation and whether they are achieving what it was hoped they would achieve. We need to follow up what [illegible] have passed to find out whether we have been successful. If one is trying to make profits, that is particularly important. There is just as much reason to do that for social and educational reasons. That applies especially to those who are concerned about the consumption of alcohol and drunkenness.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will write to me about the second matter that he has drawn to my attention. If he does, it will, as he knows, be dealt with by the Select Committee on Procedure.

I thank my hon. Friends and Opposition Members for their support; it has been excellent throughout the passage of the Bill. I thank, too, the Government for their support. I was praised for the drafting of the Bill. It would be unfair not to acknowledge that I had assistance from the Home Office to ensure that the drafting was correct. I should not want that fact to be unknown. I thank the Minister sincerely for his support.

When the Bill becomes law, I hope that we shall send out a message to youth clubs, Church organisations and all those who are trying to deal with the problem of alcohol consumption by young people that this new structure will allow them to provide for the consumption of low-alcohol drinks in youth clubs and at other social gatherings. Parents will have the assurance that their children can go to those gatherings knowing that there will be no fear of drunkenness or alcoholism. If we have achieved that today we shall have gone a long way towards dealing with one of the social problems with which society has to deal.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Horses (Protective Headgear for Young Riders) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 2

PROVISION OF HEADGEAR

'Any person who owns, controls or possesses horses which are or may be available to be ridden by young people under the age of 18 (whether or not for hire or reward) shall be under a duty to make available a supply of headgear which satisfies the provisions of regulations issued under Section 2(b) of this Act.'.—[Miss Widdecombe.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

2.5 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I shall not be pressing any of the other amendments that have been selected by Mr. Speaker, but I feel particularly strongly about new clause 2 and wish to speak to it, even given the restrictions on time.

The new clause seeks to put an absolute legal obligation on anyone who has horses available for riding without it having to be a commercial enterprise. The horses do not have to be available for riding for financial benefit or reward, they merely have to be available to be ridden by young persons. If I have any regret about the scope of the Bill, it is that it is limited to young riders and does not cover everyone. That said, it would be wrong for headgear to be made compulsory only in those establishments where young people could pay money to hire a horse and not if someone was lending a horse to the daughter of a neighbour, for example.

Most of us who derive great pleasure from riding are aware of the necessary protection that headgear provides. But I am sad, because the design of riding headgear could have been tidied up, specified and made subject to statutory regulation within the scope of the Bill. I speak with some feeling, having been thrown from a horse when I was younger than 18 and wearing the necessary headgear. I was wearing the standard design which is favoured by many riders—a peaked hard hat. A bull bellowed over a gate like a trumpet at the last judgment, and my horse reared up and threw me on to a hard road. I was not hurt by the fall beyond a few scrapes and bruises, but the force of the fall drove the hat down across my nose. Although it did not break it, it did a substantial amount of damage and was the only real injury that I sustained from the fall. Another form of headgear that is gradually becoming more favoured by riding schools, but not so much by individual riders, resembles a motorcycle helmet. it does not have a peak which can be forced down by a fall, so it protects the head without the possibility of damage being caused by the hat itself.

Any young person who rides his or her own horse or pony, a hired horse or a borrowed horse, in any place and in whatever conditions, should be made by law to wear protective headgear. It is very tempting to think, "I am only taking the horse down to the field. I am not out riding, so I do not need to put anything on my head and I do not want to have to go back to the house and fetch a hat." Young people are particularly prone to such lazy thoughts. Even on a 10-yard journey, if the horse reacts unexpectedly, even an expert rider can be thrown and sustain severe head injuries. If we make headgear a legal requirement for motor cyclists, we should certainly make it obligatory for young people riding horses. I do not wish to develop that theme, but I shall press new clause 2 because the scope of the Bill is not wide enough and will leave many people vulnerable to injuries that can be sustained when riding.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I shall be brief. If my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) looks at clause 2(1)(b) she will see that the description of the protective headgear to be worn by children is carefully and firmly covered. It is important that that should be so and I take my hon. Friend's point.

I was sorry to hear about my hon. Friend's nasty accident, but I hope that it will not colour her attitude to this important Bill.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. At 11 am, I raised a point of order, since when it has appeared on the tapes that the transcript of the conversations between the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller), the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry and a third agency have, according to Downing street, come to light. Will the Government consider making a statement at 2.30 pm?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): That is not a matter for me, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's comments have been heard.

Mr. Greenway: I have two reasons for asking my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone not to press new clause 2. First, owners of horses cannot possibly provide headgear for all the sizes of heads of children who will be required to wear it to ride horses. The safe, secure and firm fitting of headgear for riders is important. If headgear is not firm, safe and secure, it is valueless. One problem with the 80 per cent. of children under 14 who already wear protective headgear is that they may wear any protective headgear, but the Bill overcomes that and ensures that it is carefully and suitably fitted.

My second reason is on health grounds. I run a riding scheme for deprived and disabled children in London. In the early days of the scheme, 26 years ago, we provided the riding establishments that children attended for instruction with a range of 30 protective hats. The parents of the children did not like them wearing them for health reasons, and we must accept that important point.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone will understand that I am not happy about new clause 2, but I accept the warm spirit in which she moved it.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) in resisting new clause 2, but I must say at the outset that I oppose the provisions of the Bill as a whole.

One reason why the new clause is not appropriate is that many riding schools simply do not cater for or require children to ride on a road. Those schools may be located in fields some distance from a road. The new clause will make it necessary for all riding establishments to provide protective headgear whether or not they intend or envisage young people riding on roads.

Miss Widdecombe: I do not follow the force of my hon. Friend's argument. It does not matter whether someone is riding on a field or road. If someone is going full gallop across a field, he could damage himself quite horribly by falling off. Surely the Bill's purpose is to protect people wherever they are.

Mr. Waller: My hon. Friend is right, but the fact remains that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North has brought before the House a Bill relating to riding horses on public roads. As it stands, the Bill includes bridleways, although I have an amendment seeking to exclude bridleways from the Bill.

2.15 pm

The Bill is essentially related to road traffic, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic is present. It is not within the Bill's ambit to cater for the riding of horses in fields, although I fully accept that many accidents take place in fields. A study carried out in the midlands demonstrated that many more than half all accidents leading to medical treatment happen in fields or stables. However, the Bill is not about fields or anything other than roads. Therefore, it would be inconsistent with the Bill's objectives to include a requirement that would be unreasonable for many riding establishments in this country.

I shall continue to relate my comments to the new clause, but I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will allow me a little latitude because the Bill had no debate on Second Reading, but went through on the nod. Therefore, hon. Members have not had any opportunity to discuss the Bill's objectives, whether or not they include the provisions of the new clause put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe).

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that because the Bill received Second Reading on the nod, there has been no discussion in the House about whether such legislation, imposing a particular form of safety protection, is necessary? I speak not as a rider, but as a former rock climber. The belief 10 years ago that helmets, or some form of protective headgear, were essential at all levels of climbing, is very much out of fashion now. More and more of the country's leading rock climbers eschew headgear because they regard it as dangerous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Bill has received Second Reading, albeit on the nod, so it would be inappropriate to jog back to that stage now. We must stick to the new clause.

Mr Waller: I take note of that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern).

The Department of Transport has said that resources have to be directed at major road safety problems. I heartily endorse that. Fortunately, there are few accidents involving horse riders compared with the number of accidents involving pedal cyclists. Bearing in mind the little discussion there has been in the House—even in Committee only two hon. Members apart from the Bill's promoter and the Minister, spoke—and that only two of the Bill's sponsors are here to support my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North, it is important that the many amendments down for discussion should at least be considered.

The fact that a defence, included in the Bill that my hon. Friend originally brought before the House, has been removed from the Bill without debate is a good reason for debating those matters now. I do not doubt my hon. Friend's sincerity, and I recognise that he feels strongly about the matter. However, I hope that he will recognise that others feel that while the law has a part to play in many areas of life, we should be cautious and require good reasons before extending it into an area where many people still believe that personal responsibility, including that of parents and guardians, is important.

Mr. Stern: I intend to speak briefly on the new clause. I find a number of aspects of the new clause troubling and I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) will have time to deal with my doubts. I have two main doubts, First, the new clause refers to "young people under the age of 18".

I am sure that my hon. Friend would agree that we are dealing with young people who are at different stages of physical development. As the hobby, habit and skill of riding become more popular and as riding becomes more frequently available in schools, I have no doubt that more and more young people of many different ages will take it up. Will my hon. Friend comment on the practicality of the universal obligation she proposes, which would have the effect that any provider of horses that are available to be ridden by young people must carry a range of protective headgear wide enough to protect children from the age of about four?

Miss Widdecombe: There is nothing in the new clause to prevent the young people in question from coming along with their own headgear. The new clause would insist that headgear should be made available. It would be in order for there to be an agreement between the owner of the horse and the person riding the horse that the latter would bring his own headgear. The new clause seeks only to stop young people borrowing a horse and riding it without headgear.

Mr. Stern: My hon. Friend misses the point. A young person and his parent or guardian may come to try out riding for the first time without such headgear—and given the cost of equipment for most sports, it is highly likely that a child trying riding for the first time will come along without such headgear. The hon. Lady would place an onerous duty on the provider of the horse. Under the new clause, it would be necessary to provide a range of headgear for young people from the ages of four to 18.

My hon. Friend has a detailed knowledge of health and social security matters. I am sure that she is aware of the increasing science involved in the study of head injuries and the necessity to provide different types of headgear for different bone structures. I am worried that the duty she seeks to impose is unduly onerous, especially for small riding establishments.

Secondly, who is to enforce that duty? Are we saying that under the law, it will be necessary for an enforcement body to check periodically whether a riding establishment provides a range of headgear to cover every potential customer? Where are the resources to come from to provide what would effectively be an inspectorate for riding establishments? Where is the register of riding establishments necessary for that inspection to work?

Mr. Harry Greenway: I must explain that all riding establishments have to be licensed and that they are inspected before being licensed. Part of that inspection could easily include examining the headgear that should be available. However, I have two objections to the new clause, including an objection on the ground of hygiene.

Mr. Stern: My hon. Friend is quite right, but under any sensible inspection regime, a once-and-for-all inspection is wholly inadequate. An additonal duty will therefore be placed on the inspectorate to ensure that an adequate range of headgear is made available for the purposes of the Bill. I am happy for such a duty to be laid on the inspectorate if the Bill is passed, but I question what resources would be necessary and whether we should place such a duty on every single riding establishment.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I welcome this opportunity to discuss the Bill. My view on the new clause is that I do not think that we should complicate the Bill too much. I declare an interest because I was brought up on a pony and during an undistinguished career as an amateur steeplechase jockey I had the chance to ride in about 50 races. I owe my life to the fact that I was wearing a crash hat when I had a number of bad falls. We should do all what we can to get the details of the Bill right. I tabled several amendments to the Bill, but unfortunately they were not selected. I had the idea of adding after the word "horses" the words "cows and other large quadrupeds".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not refer to amendments that may or may not be discussed later. He must stick to the new clause.

Mr. Bellingham: In an ideal world, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Bill would also refer to cows and other large quadrupeds. We say that we are concerned about children riding horses and ponies but I have seen children riding bulls, elephants and camels. They could well ride such large quadrupeds without the proper headgear. However slim or remote the evenutality may seem, we should be aware that that could happen and I trust that the Minister will refer to it in his remarks.

We should be careful about complicating the Bill by adding the new clause. The Bill is excellent and I have always supported it. I particularly welcome the growing trend in riding circles for children and riders of all ages to wear proper approved crash hats rather than hunting caps, bowler hats or other forms of headgear. More and more responsible riding establishments, parents and horse owners will not let a horse out of the yard unless the rider is wearing a proper crash hat. We all know that, as a result of the move towards better safety standards, many lives have been saved. In the past, a large number of jockeys and stable lads at racing stables were seriously injured because they were not wearing proper headgear when they fell off a horse on the flat. Ten years ago, before the Jockey Club introduced rules whereby all riding stables had to insist on everyone wearing a proper crash hat, many accidents occurred that could have been avoided. That was probably the start of riding circles' increased efforts to insist that children in particular wore crash hats.

The Bill is a move in the right direction. I should have preferred it to be wider but, bearing in mind the objections expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, I am prepared to accept it as drafted. It would be a mistake to complicate the Bill by an unnecessary new clause and it might prevent this excellent Bill from proceeding.

The Minister for Roads and Traffic (Mr. Robert Atkins): I have only a few moments and I do not intend to be on my feet at the close of play. Let me record first of all the Govenment's support for the Bill in general terms but our worries about the new clause, which would require persons who own, control or possess horses available to be ridden by young people under the age of 18 to have a supply of headgear that satisfies the regulations. A similar clause was moved in the Standing Committee, of which I was not a member. The clause is tangential to the purpose of the Bill, which seeks to ensure that children riding horses on the road should have to wear helmets. Irrespective of the place from which they set out and in what circumstances, an offence will prima facie have been committed if a child is discovered riding on the road without a helmet.

The problem about new clause 2, which was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), is that a riding establishment may allow horses to be ridden only in the field, which is not within the scope of the Bill. It would be inconsistent to impose an obligation to hold helmets at a riding school whose horses are ridden only in fields, so we cannot support the clause.

Miss Widdecombe: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, and clause, by leave withdrawn.

Mr. Waller: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be in order for me to speak on amendment No. 16——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

It being half-past Two o'clock the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 27 April.

Private Members' Bills

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You were in the Chair at 2.10 pm when I raised, on a point of order, the statement by No. 10 Downing street to the effect that the transcript of conversations between the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller), the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry and a third agency had now come to light. I ask that a Minister should come to the House to explain exactly what had happened and why it was that when the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry offered a statement on that subject on Wednesday, the transcript at that time——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman is addressing his remarks more to the Government than to me. What is the point of order?

Mr. Dalyell: My point of order is on whether you have had any approach from any Minister. I warned Mr. Derek Kerr, one of the Private Secretaries in Downing street, that I would raise the matter. Have you had any requests from any Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, the Ministry of Defence or a representative of the third agency —which is the responsibility of the Prime Minister—to come to the House to explain precisely what has happened, when those transcripts came to light, when they were brought to the knowledge of Ministers and when the Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), first knew that there was a problem about the export orders to Iraq, which is the question that I and other hon. Members have been asking since last Wednesday?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can deal with the hon. Member's point. I have had no such request, but I am sure that the issues he has raised have been noted.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not generally accepted that even on a Friday, when a lot of hon. Members leave the building, Ministers should always be available? That even applies during the long recess. It appears that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) gave due notice at 11 am today about the purpose of his remarks and the fact that there is a cover-up involving No. 10 Downing street, and various other Departments, including the Department of Trade and Industry, over the Iraqi gun fiasco. We are reaching a sorry state when we have a Government who supposedly believe in defence but do not know the difference between a gun barrel and a pipeline. My hon. Friend is trying to get to the root of the matter. Parliament should deal with it. The Chair is being placed in an invidious position because Ministers are not available to answer such important questions. Every day that passes, Ministers are failing in their duty.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has openly declared his desire to see his Ministry abolished. Is there any wonder that the Iraqis are able to buy guns and God knows what else when a Minister says, "I want to get rid of my Department." That really is a scandal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can merely reiterate that I have had no request in respect of a statement.

RIGHTS OF WAY (AGRICULTURAL LAND) BILL

[MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Rights of Way (Agricultural Land) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of such money under any other Act.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Hospital Facilities (Isle of Sheppey)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

2.38 pm

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I welcome this opportunity to raise in the House the closure of acute hospital services on the Isle of Sheppey and the urgent need for new hospitals on Sheppey and in Sittingbourne. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Minister for Health is here to reply to this important debate.

To many, an Adjournment debate in the House may seem to be a modest affair. However, I assure the House that it is of the utmost importance to my constituents that Parliament and the Government understand that there is a sense of crisis prevailing on the Isle of Sheppey.

Three months from now we face the closure of acute medical and geriatric services on Sheppey. Three years ago we saw the closure of surgery, obstetrics and gynaecology on Sheppey—a modern maternity unit. Before that, some years ago, the full casualty service, children's wards and the paediatric service were also closed.

The Isle of Sheppey is in the prosperous south of England, and has a population of 35,000 that more than doubles in the summer months. It is an important industrial area, containing one of Britain's successful ports, one of its most successful steel mills and much more. Its only link with the mainland is a lifting bridge and an inadequate road system. Now it has no acute hospital facilities. Is it any wonder that its residents are angry, and that many consider the problem to be literally a matter of life and death?

All this follows years of progressive rundown. It is almost exactly 20 years since, in a maiden speech, I spoke of the need to defend our local hospitals, and I have done so again many times since while presenting petitions and in Adjournment debates. Often dedicated local action groups such as the Sheppey watch committee have sent deputations to Ministers—Conservative and Labour—and have received kind and helpful assurances; nevertheless, the rundown has continued. We now feel that we have come to the end of the road.

My constituents and I want real, tangible help, and I intend to continue to press for that help from the Minister and the Secretary of State. We want new hospital facilities —not in the 21st century, but soon. We are not crying for the moon; we are merely asking for the implementation of sensible, practical proposals that already form part of a proper district and regional strategy. Our plea is for the minimum level of hospital services that the people of Swale are entitled to expect in the 21st century. It is also a plea for extra resources, and Ministers can exert their influence directly in that regard.

We want a fairer share of those resources for the Medway health district, to enable it to build new hospitals and to finance it from year to year. For years local Members of Parliament, among others, have argued that Medway is a deprived district in an otherwise prosperous region. In 1985, under the old resource allocation working party formula, Medway had reached only 77 per cent. of its target. To correct the shortfall, we were entirely dependent on the rate at which other districts in the theoretically over-provided south-east could reduce their expenditure—and that was a pretty forlorn prospect.

Surely it is self-evident nonsense that the largest, most concentrated population centre in Kent—which is certainly not the wealthiest part of the region—should receive the poorest hospital provision. When it was decided to end the RAWP system, many of us thought that Medway would at last receive proper funding from the region or from central Government; sadly, we now learn that that is not to be. Under the new resident capitation rules—I am not sure whether they have been finalised—Medway will remain much poorer than most other parts of the region. It will be £13 worse off per resident than the next worst-funded district in South East Thames. Medway will receive £173 a head, and Brighton some £212. The teaching district of Lambeth will receive about £400 a head and Greenwich about £268 a head, although I accept that different considerations apply there.

It has always been suggested that a safety net figure of about £200 a head should be built into capitation. Such a fair system would give Medway about £9 million a year, and Brighton about £13 million. That would enable us to fund our much-needed hospital programme, which has already been largely agreed in principle by all concerned.

As I understand it, the reason for the under-provision proposed in the new arrangements lies in the fact that the region has a number of districts with a higher proportion of elderly people. But in those districts there are almost twice the number of private hospitals and private nursing homes per 1,000 population over 65 than we have in Medway. Does it make sense to give more money to relatively prosperous retirement areas and less money to poorer or relatively poorer, more concentrated industrial areas? The logic of that does not bear too much analysis. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to look at that matter closely, urgently and sympathetically. If we can get this matter right, other things will follow.

The first thing that we need is a fair allocation of extra revenue—for example, the missing £9 million plus for Medway. The rules are not being changed, and this is the moment for the Minister to help us. The next thing that we need is approval for the Medway hospital phase 3C project which was taken out of the programme this year—that was a tremendous shock in Medway, which has a history of a sense of deprivation—just when the project had reached tender stage. It was another major setback for us. At the same time we need my hon. Friend's help to secure immediate funding for our primary care hospitals on Sheppey and in Sittingbourne.

I shall not rehearse the arguments for and against the concept of primary care hospitals. However, for many years many of us have campaigned for what was the declared policy objective—a second district general hospital in Swale or the so-called bi-polar strategy. That district general hospital, which would have been at Sittingbourne and would have replaced Sheppey general hospital and other facilities, obviously would not have satisfied the aspirations of the people of the Isle of Sheppey to have their own district hospital. The concept of a second district general hospital has been so reduced and undermined as to have lost credibility and support. Of course, there are those who urge that Sheppey general hospital should be restored to its full general hospital status—120 beds, a full range of services, casualty, surgery, medicine, maternity and so on. I should like nothing better than that.

In practice, we are faced with the overpowering logic not of politics or resources—not in any meaningful sense, anyway—but of the changing medical technology and more stringent standards that are imposed on us by the royal colleges. We understand also that a new district general hospital with a full range of consultant cover is designed to serve a much greater population than the population of the Isle of Sheppey. That is the argument for or against a new hospital. As much as we should like it, we recognise that there is little prospect of it ever happening. Our view and that of most people on the island and of Medway health authority has always been that we should retain the widest range of acute services until we can get new provision for hospitals in Swale. That consensus has been underminded by the royal colleges.

I must now record my resentment and anger at the behaviour of the royal colleges. I have said elsewhere that their attitude makes them appear not as protectors of the public, which is how I presume they would see themselves, but as predators. That is a harsh thing to say, and they will understand why. They always seem concerned that their senior house officers might suffer from remoteness and not get the necessary training and experience from hospitals such as Sheppey general hospital, but apparently they do not care that that very remoteness endangers the lives and well-being of the patients whom they are supposed to serve. It was only two years ago that the Royal College of Physicians accepted the present arrangements at Sheppey, but now it gives us just a few months' notice that, in effect, acute medicine and acute geriatric services must be withdrawn from Sheppey.

We now come to primary care hospitals. Let me make it clear that this is no cheap-jack solution. It is estimated that the four primary care hospitals planned for Medway would cost as much as a district general hospital. I believe it to be a good concept, but it is certainly not cheap. The concept has been approved by Medway district health authority and by most local bodies, including the community health council. The region has accepted that a case of need exists, and it goes along with the concept.

Each primary care hospital is expected to be based on between 30 and 72 in-patient beds, sites between three and six acres, entrance and reception areas, day hospital areas, out-patient clinics, treatment rooms for minor casualties, minor elective surgery, X-ray facilities and some pathology facilities. The primary care philosophy would depend for its success on a major contribution from general practitioners. That must be funded if only because it will mean extra GPs. It would depend on greater reliance on senior nursing skills, which would be welcome, extensive out-patient clinics, which would involve all consultants, and limited casual facilities. Such hospitals could obtain the confidence and involvement of the local communities and be seen as a logical complement to the high-tech district general hospitals.

Primary care hospitals must be purpose-built, modern and well-funded. There is talk of using existing buildings as an interim measure, given the present emergency. That is not a good solution, but it might be the only one available. None the less, we should not lose sight of the urgency and importance of obtaining funding for the new primary care hospitals.

How can we obtain approval and the resources for the new hospitals at the earliest opportunity? I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say that if we come forward with proposals for what I might call unconventional funding we shall have her support in securing approval from her Department and the Treasury. If we simply ask for conventional funding I hope that she will do her utmost to persuade the regional health authority of the necessity of giving Medway district health authority its fair share of support as a matter of extreme urgency. My hon. Friend could do a tremendous amount to help us on the Isle of Sheppey in those important matters.

I shall make two more brief points. Although I could spend much more time on the subject, that time is not available. Last year the Secretary of State insisted that a transportation study should be undertaken to examine the problems that arise from the remoteness of many people on the Isle of Sheppey, in Sittingbourne and elsewhere, and their difficulty in gaining access to centralised hospital facilities following the closure of local facilities. What has happened to that report? Has it yet been received and when can we expect results from it?

My last point is important, but I do not have time to deal with it at any length. It is what I call the "life and death" question for people living in remote areas. They have seen acute emergency local hospital services progressively run down. That might be an inevitable consequence of changing technology and centralisation but none the less people are entitled to the assurance that they will receive the same, or better, immediate life-saving and emergency treatment as in the past. Presumably, that depends on increased paramedic ambulance services, and on the provision of a range of life-saving equipment at local and community hospitals and at doctors' surgeries.

People on the Isle of Sheppey will want to know how tne hospital service in its broadest sense will give them and their families the assurances to which they are entitled. On that matter and the general question of our inadequate hospital services in Swale, I hope that my hon. Friend can help us.

2.53 pm

The Minister for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) on so persistently, carefully and thoughtfully setting out the understandable anxieties of his constituents about the development of health services in his area. He forcefully made it clear that in the prosperous south-east the Isle of Sheppey has special circumstances and needs. I know the area moderately well because in a previous role I visited the Isle of Sheppey to look, not at health services but at birds. I am therefore well aware of some of the geographical features, and especially of the fact that the Isle of Sheppey is bound to the mainland by one bridge. I am also aware of the understandable effect of those geographical conditions on the provision of health services.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham said, he has raised the concerns of his constituents on several occasions in the House and I congratulate him on securing this Adjournment debate to rehearse these precise points once again. Before responding to his case, I wish to point out—as I am sure my hon. Friend is aware—that it is the Government's policy to delegate responsibility for the provision and organisation of local health services to local management. The Government provide a framework for those services by setting priorities and guidelines and by providing resources to the regional health authorities to allocate in turn to the district health authorities.

I shall be taking up a number of points that my hon. Friend has raised in more detail with the chairman of the regional health authority to see what further room there may be for manoeuvre and clarification and to ensure that my hon. Friend's constituents receive the improving quality of patient care that we wish to see throughout the country.

I understand my hon. Friend's concern about Medway health authority's recent announcement that further acute in-patient facilities will be removed from the island to hospitals in the Medway towns on the mainland. As he said, the circumstances are similar to those which led to the transfer of obstetric and gynaecological services from Sheppey general hospital to the mainland initially on a temporary basis in 1987. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State approved proposals to make the changes permanent in May 1989 and, in making his decision took account of the higher standard of care—in the form of the comprehensive back-up facilities and expensive medical technology—that would be offered by centralising acute in-patient services.

My hon. Friend thoughtfully spelt out some of the considerations that arise from the changing technology of medical care. Whereas in the past it was possible to have several district general hospitals, offering roughly equivalent standards of care, increasingly with the techniques that are becoming available and the methods of resuscitation, intensive care and the number of facilities that are normally expected, health authorities have to think again about the way in which their resources are deployed.

My hon. Friend expressed something stronger than disappointment about the announcement by the Royal College of Physicians that from 31 July 1990 it is planning to withdraw accreditation for junior doctor training at Sheppey general hospital. The facilities offered for training there are, indeed, limited. There is no coronary care unit, no on-site surgery; a limited range of radiology and pathology facilities; library facilities are poor and there is no accommodation for any postgraduate activity. The withdrawal of its accreditation for training means that it would be difficult to staff the hospital in its current role. I well understand my hon. Friend's reaction to that announcement. I am sure that he will understand that as I also have responsibility for junior hospital doctors, I have perhaps more understandings of their position on this matter. Nevertheless, I am well aware of my hon. Friend's reaction to the implications for his constituents.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, the health authority's long-term strategy was to offer acute services from a centralised site at Medway district general hospital in Gillingham and to suport them by local primary care hospitals, one of which would be Sheppey general. Again, my hon. Friend spelt out in some detail the important contribution that primary care hospitals can make. However, the royal college's decision means that the health authority finds it necessary to proceed with long-term plans for Sheppey earlier than intended. I should emphasise, however, that the health authority will be considering carefully the consultation required, given that it believes that it is necessary that the changed pattern in service should be in place by August, but certainly the community health council's views will be taken into account.

Similarly, I understand my hon. Friend's concerns about transport. We have already described the geographical location of Sheppey. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health recognised those problems in May 1989 when he approved Medway health authority's plans involving the permanent closure of obstetric and surgical in-patient services at Sheppey general hospital and requested that a report on transport services for Sheppey residents should be made. As my hon. Friend is aware, Medway health authority officials will shortly be meeting Kent county council officials to review transport services. Following that, I hope that it will be possible to give further information to my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend will also be aware, no doubt, that since the transport survey was undertaken, the excellent south-east air ambulance is now operational. The primary role of that service is to provide speedy transport to the hospital services required, especially for patients who are ill or injured in isolated rural areas such as Sheppey, where access may be difficult.

I am aware that in particular the lifting bridge, giving the only road access, has been a source of serious concern. The helicopter service carries a team of specially trained paramedics who can provide on-the-spot emergency treatment and stabilise patients before transporting them to hospital services. It is based at Rochester airport and became operational in December. Since then, it has proved its worth in speeding accident victims to hospital and transferring patients to units that provide the specialist care that they require for their recovery. From the date that it was put into service until April of this year, it has already responded to seven calls from the Isle of Sheppey, four of which resulted in the patient being speedily removed to hospital on the mainland.

To take up my hon. Friend's point about the importance of recognised paramedic qualifications, after the disappointment that surrounded the dispute this winter there has been widespread recognition of the importance of paramedic training for real accident and emergency cases. That issue is being considered by the Department of Health, throughout the Health Service and in the regions. I shall certainly incorporate my hon. Friend's comments in our thinking on the matter.

My hon. Friend also raised questions about the finances of Medway health authority. He will be aware that the allocation of resources to the health authority is a matter for South East Thames regional health authority. Last year, the health authority received an allocation of just over £66 million. That has risen to just over £73 million for this year.

The region as a whole will benefit from the new weighted capitation system of funding, to which my hon. Friend referred. The region's interim proposals for the pace of change for districts from the resource allocation working party system of funding to a weighted capitation system of funding mean that Medway will receive the same growth money as that previously planned under RAWP —a sum of £870,000 for the current financial year.

My hon. Friend referred in detail to the nature of his constituency and to social deprivation. The formula used by the Department to allocate funds to the regions takes account of the size, age and health of a region's population, with an additional allowance for the higher cost of providing services within London. To some extent, deprivation is recognised in that formula, as in taking account of the pattern of ill health the Department uses information related to premature death rates, which are known to be closely correlated with measures of deprivation.

Regions will allocate money to districts using a weighted capitation formula, but they also have discretion to include weightings in addition to those used in the national formula in order that funding may be sensitive to local circumstances. The Department has encouraged regions to consider factors such as social deprivation, if that is appropriate and significant locally.

The question of social deprivation is one which South East Thames regional health authority is currently considering. Discussions are in progress as to whether that factor might be taken into account and, if so, on what basis. I cannot say, as yet, what the outcome might be for Medway health authority. However, I urge my hon. Friend to take up his views on social deprivation in Medway with the chairman of South East Thames regional health authority. I am sure that he would welcome the opportunity to consider that aspect, in view of the regional health authority's continuing discussions on that matter.

We should not lose sight of the fact that when the weighted capitation system of funding comes fully into play, the role of the districts will have changed. They will be not the providers but the purchasers of health services for their resident population. That important but subtle distinction, which is part of our proposals for reforming and improving the Health Service, means that the district health authorities, along with the family practitioner committees—to be known as the family health service authorities—will have a special role of examining the health needs of their local population and deciding how best to meet those needs within the available resources.

My hon. Friend also expressed his concern about the delay in starting the next phase of Medway district general hospital. He will know that a £35 million capital programme is being undertaken. He will appreciate that, along with a number of other capital programmes in the region, the time scale for it has had to be reviewed because of falling land prices. It is a matter that will require further consideration and I shall certainly take into account the important points that my hon. Friend made, particularly in the light of the new circumstances surrounding the royal college's decision. However, I should not wish that setback to detract from the recent achievements in the health authority's capital programme. I understand that there has been a £1·8 million development at Keycol hospital, which will provide day care and in-patient facilities for the elderly mentally ill. That facility has recently become operational. It serves a group who, frankly, in the past, were not given the priority that they deserve. It will serve the Isle of Sheppey and Sittingbourne.

Earlier this year, another major stage of Medway district general hospital started taking its first patients. It was a £13·8 million development taking patients for psychiatric, psycho-geriatric and geriatric treatment. I am delighted to have accepted an invitation formally to open that development and very much look forward to seeing at first hand some of the new, modern facilities at Medway district general hospital that can provide improved care.

My hon. Friend spoke about the role of primary care hospitals and the way in which they can be funded and further progress made. When specific proposals are brought forward, I and my ministerial colleagues will consider them carefully and have urgent discussions with the regional health authority about the best way in which progress can be made.

In referring to the enhanced role of the family practitioner service, my hon. Friend hit upon one of the fundamental directions in which we wish our Health Service to move. There has been a substantial increase in spending, in numbers and in the care that general practitioners provide to their patients. Our recent proposals, including the contract and the opportunities provided in the National Health Service and Community Care Bill, are a vote of confidence in general practitioners and will ensure that the family practitioner service works closely with the community services. The acute services will be fundamental to providing the quality and standard of health care that I know my hon. Friend seeks. He represents a constituency——

The Question having been proposed after half-past Two o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at eight minutes past Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 26 March 1990

PRIME MINISTER

Question Time

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make it her policy (a) to make her answers at Prime Minister's Question Time more brief and (b) to seek to make greater use of statements at 3.30 pm

The Prime Minister: It is not always appropriate to provide brief answers to some of the questions which are asked.

Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many representations she has received, and from whom, calling for the separation of a Ministry of Food from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received representations calling for the separation of a Ministry of Food from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, as well as representations in favour of maintaining a single Department.

I do not believe that the interests of the consumer and industry would be best served by such a separation. The present arrangements ensure that ministerial responsibility for the food chain is covered from the point of production to the point of sale to the consumer. I said at the Royal show last year that I do not propose to dismember the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. This remains my view.

Nuclear Accident (Emergency Procedures)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will conduct a review of emergency procedures in the event of an accident at a nuclear power station in northern France, and the subsequent radioactive contamination of the United Kingdom population, food supplies and the environment; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom's emergency procedures for dealing with a nuclear accident overseas were thoroughly reviewed after the Chernobyl incident in April 1986. I reported the first results of that review to the House on 18 December 1986, Official Report, columns 612-13. I reported again on 30 June 1987, Official Report, columns 65-67. The contingency arrangements now in place would be implemented in the event of an accident at a nuclear power station in northern France or elsewhere which could have consequences for the United Kingdom. In the unlikely event of any such accident there would be, in accordance with normal practice following any emergency, a further review of our contingency arrangements in the light of experience gained.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Non-custodial sentences

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number and proportion of offences triable only on indictment which attracted non-custodial sentences in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: Information for 1986 to 1988 is given in the table.

Data for 1989 will not be available until autumn 1990.

Persons given non-custodial sentences for offences triable only on indictment 1986 to 1988
England and Wales

Year	Total sentenced	Number given non-custodial sentences	Per cent.
1986	9,679	2,520	26
1987	10,163	2,498	25
1988	10,464	2,752	26

Animal Experiments

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether animal experiments conducted under LD50 tests are still being licensed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Yes. The latest available information is published in table 14 of the "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals, Great Britain, 1988" (Cm. 743).

Personal Security Systems

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider providing pensioners, the disabled and those without incomes with grants to enable the installation at their homes of personal security systems.

Mr. John Patten: No. There are many examples of lock fitting schemes being conducted without a need for an individual householder's grant. These have often been carried out with valuable private sector support, and our safer cities programme already includes projects of this kind. Local authorities may also have access to urban programme and estate action resources for such purposes.

ENVIRONMENT

Chemicals (North Sea)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tonnes per annum of (a) nitrates, (b) phosphates, (c) cadmium, (d) zinc, (e) lead, (f) copper, (g) mercury and (h) liquid low level radioactive wastes in each case from United Kingdom sources are discharged or dumped into the North sea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Recent information on United Kingdom inputs of contaminants to the North sea via rivers, coastal discharges and dumping from ships is included in the 1990 interim report on the quality status of the North sea prepared for the third North sea conference in the Hague on 7 and 8 March. I am placing a copy in the Library together with the ministerial declaration and the implementation report on the action taken by North sea states since the London conference to reduce these discharges still further.

Some of the figures quoted in the interim quality status report have been compiled using differing methodologies, particularly in the case of river inputs and are, therefore, not directly comparable.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to take steps to ensure that volunteer carers who are employed by individual disabled people and who have not been introduced to that person by an independent charitable organisation will be exempt from the community charge, provided that they meet the other exemption criteria.

Mr. Chope: The criteria for the exemption of care workers require, inter alia, that the individual is employed to provide care or support to another person and that the employer is either a public authority, a body established for charitable purposes only, or the person receiving care. In this last circumstance I regard it as helpful that the regulations enable a community charges registration officer to have confirmation of the position of the claimant from an independent charitable organisation.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total net spending and relevant applicable community charge, to levels of spending at standard spending assessment, 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. above standard spending assessment, and the increase or decrease in each case against the currently approved community charge for each charging local authority.

Mr. Chope: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 19 March 1990, Official Report, column 478.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for how many local authorities the poll tax is higher than the notional figure used in setting the level which income support beneficiaries are required to pay; what is the median amount by which they are higher; and what is the number and names of those which are lower.

Mr. Chope: The Government do not set a level of community charge which income support beneficiaries are required to pay.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy when he publishes the poll tax figures for each English district council to publish for each district the amount per capital also due to (a) that district, (b) the county, (c) the amount of each of these offseet by Government grants, (d) the safety net figure per capita plus or minus, (e) the amount per capita that poll tax would have been had central Government financed 50 per cent. of local Government spending and (f) the per capita gain or loss for the uniform business rate.

Mr. Chope: No.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the estimated total amounts of spending in 1989-90 and in 1990-91, and the percentage increase for (a) each English shire county and (b) each shire district within Somerset, Devon, Dorset and Wiltshire.

Mr. Chope: I intend to place a summary of the information returned from local authorities in the Library of the House after information has been received from all authorities.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to introduce regulations which ensure that a carer who resides part-time in his or her home and the remainder of the time in the home of the person being cared for pays only one poll tax liability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The Community Charges (Miscellaneous Provisions) (No. 2) Regulations 1989 came into force on 28 December 1989. Regulations 62 of the regulations provides that no standard community charge will be payable on a property where the owner has moved to live in another place for the purpose of giving personal care and the property has been unoccupied for less than 12 months. Charging authorities have the discretion to extend the period of relief.

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the conditions for the imposition of the standard community charge on a former home which the owner has not be able to sell within the present three-month limit.

Mr. Chope: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities to my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) on 21 March 1990, Official Report, columns 658-59.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list, in order of percentage loss or gain, the grant-related expenditure for 1989-90 against the standard spending assessment for 1990-91 for all English counties; what is the cost change between the two; and if he will list for each the proportion of the population living in urban areas.

Mr. Chope: The information requested is shown in the table. The proportion of the population living in urban areas is calculated from data in the 1981 Census publication "Key Statistics for Urban Areas" which contains a definition of urban areas. Similar data are not readily available for district councils or London boroughs.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 19 March, how he calculates the figures of (a) £28 and (b) £2.

Mr. Chope: The figures are calculated by applying the appropriate monetary weights given in paragraph 3.32 of the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) to the values of the specified indicators for Humberside, multiplying the result by the appropriate national scaling factor for highway maintenance and expressing the result as an amount per relevant adult (rounded to the nearest £1).

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of (a) the number of second homes, (b) the relationship of the standard charge to the poll tax and (c) the extra revenue accruing from this for each local authority in England; what are his proposals for taking this into account in faxing next year's expenditure targets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Detailed information on the number of people registered as subject to the standard community charge, or on the multipliers being set by charging authorities is not yet available to the Department. Income from the standard charge is not taken into account in determining English local authorities' revenue-raising capacity for the purposes of grant distribution.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment with reference to his Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England), annex A, V, highway maintenance, what was the basis on which the multipliers for road type weighting factors were arrived at.

Mr. Chope: Road lengths of different types are weighted in the following proportions:

	Weighted
Principal roads in built-up areas	6
Principal roads in non-built-up areas	3
Other roads in built-up areas	2
Other roads in non-built-up areas	1

These weightings assume that the average cost of maintaining principal roads is three times that of maintaining non-principal roads and that the cost of maintaining built-up roads is double that of maintaining non-built-up roads. The 3:1 relative cost weighting between principal and non-principal roads is based on analysis of expenditure data for the two types of road from maintenance outturn forms returned to the Department of Transport. The 2:1 ratio between built-up and non-built-up roads is based on evidence from sparsely populated counties provided by the Association of County Councils in the early 1980s.

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to require councils to reduce their community charge level next year by the amount contained in this year's charge for their contribution to the safety net.

Mr. Chope: No, although I hope that councils will do so voluntarily. Community charge bills in 1990-91 show safety net contributions as a separate item. In following years bills for authorities that formerly contributed to the safety net will show a straightforward comparison between the amount needed to provide a standard level of service and authorities' actual spending plans. It will be for authorities to justify to their chargepayers any excess of the latter over the former. For authorities receiving area protection grant, which replaces the safety net after 1990-91, this will appear as a separate item on community charge bills.

Lancashire (Derelict Land Reclamation)

Mr. Miscampbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much funding has been provided by the Government for derelict land reclamation in Lancashire in each of the last three years.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested is as follows:

£ million

Grant programme	Actual 1987-88	Actual 1988-89	Forecast 1989-90
Derelict land grant	4·102	3·278	4·047
Urban programme[1]	0·372	0·166	0·264
Urban development grant Urban regeneration grant City grant [1][2]	3·941	2·665	3·535

[1] Includes expenditure on unused or waste land as well as derelict land.

[2] Information does not relate solely to the costs of reclamation since grant is based on the total project costs including those of reclamation.

New Town Tenants

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new towns tenants have bought their homes since the right to buy was introduced; and if he will show the percentages for each new town in England and Wales.

Mr. Chope: Some 28,300 tenants have bought their homes from English new town corporations since October 1980, of which 9,400 were bought under the terms of the right-to-buy legislation. This does not include the number of tenants who have bought their homes after the transfer of new town stock to various local authorities and housing associations during the period; these sales cannot be distinguished from other sales by local authorities and housing associations.

The table gives the estimated percentage of stock sold by individual new towns to tenants between October 1980 and the date of transfer to local authorities and-or housing associations.

	Date of transfer	Percentage of stock sold to sitting tenants

For information about Welsh new towns I refer my hon. Friend to the Secretary of State for Wales.

Beach Pollution (Cleethorpes)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action is being taken to remedy the design fault in Cleethorpes long sea outfall pipe;

(2) what action is being taken to stop designated bathing beaches at Bridlington, Cleethorpes, Hornsea and Withernsea being polluted by raw sewage from storm overflow pipes;

(3) what action is being taken to stop sewage discharges from Grimsby, Paull and Hull being deposited on beaches in the Cleethorpes area.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: These are matters for the National Rivers Authority.

Radon

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated percentage of properties in each Cornwall district with radon concentration above the new action level.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The estimated proportion of houses exceeding the new action level in each Cornwall district is as follows:

	per cent.
Caradon	20
Carrick	15
Kerrier	30
North Cornwall	25
Penwith	30
Restormel	20

Housing Associations

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what account is taken in providing grants for new housing associations of the assets or funding available to them in the allocation of resources for 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: Housing Corporation circulars HC31/88 and HC74/89 set out the financial viability criteria that the corporation applies where registered housing associations seek housing association grant. They cover associations' property assets and reserves, and also their management competence. The corporation has discretion to vary the criteria for small or new associations.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average rent payable by a disabled person living in special needs accommodation provided by housing associations operating on Merseyside.

Mr. Chope: The Department does not have this information.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the levels of grants payable to housing associations on Merseyside providing accommodation for people with special needs.

Mr. Chope: None, other than the hon. Member's letter of 16 March to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about a proposed housing association development at Fazakerley, to which I shall be replying shortly.

Rents

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department keeps an index of housing costs for those living in rented accommodation.

Mr. Chope: The Department does not maintain such an index. There are separate indices for rent and other items of housing expenditure within the general index of retail prices (RPI), which is published monthly by the Central Statistical Office. The RPI, of course, reflects the expenditure patterns of the majority of households and not just those in rented accommodation.

Pollution (Fines)

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average fine imposed by magistrates courts in 1988 for river and harbour pollution.

Mr. Heatcoat-Amory: Information collected by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department shows that for cases brought under sections 31 or 32 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 the average fine imposed by magistrates courts in 1988 for water pollution offences was £560. The maximum fine available is £2,000 and up to three months' imprisonment. On indictment in the Crown Court there is no limit on the fine that may be imposed and terms of imprisonment can be up to two years.

Local Government Boundaries

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the progress of the Local Government Boundary Commission's proposals for the Suffolk-Cambridgeshire border.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Commission's programme is a matter for it to determine within the statutory requirement that it should complete the review of English county boundaries by 31 March 1992. I understand that the commission is actively considering the Suffolk-Cambridgeshire boundary in the light of responses to its draft proposals.

Mortgaged Property

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make it his policy to introduce a duty of disclosure to oblige landlords to disclose (a) details of outstanding charges against the property at the start of a lease and (b) whether the lender has granted permission for the property to be let;

(2) if he will make it his policy to oblige mortgage lenders to obtain from borrowers an annual confirmation of occupiers of mortgaged property; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will make it his policy to seek to amend part III of the Housing Act 1985 to make it a statutory duty on housing authorities to accommodate people who are outside the existing categories of the involuntarily homeless, who are made homeless because the landlord to whom they were paying rent has unbeknown to them failed to pay his mortgage on that property;

(4) what legislation would need to be amended to bring into effect protection for people who pay rent to a landlord for property which they do not know is mortgaged;

(5) if he will review the arrangements for repossessions of property by court orders where a borrower has failed to meet mortgage repayments but has collected rent from a tenant in the property, to enable the tenant to be offered a first refusal on an option to buy or an assured tenancy for a limited period.

Mr. Chope: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Local Government and Housing Act 1989

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has had any consultations with local authority associations on the main provision of part VIII of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 since January 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Following the announcement on 22 February to defer implementation of part VIII of the 1989 Act until 1 July, the local authority associations have been consulted on the draft regulations for the test of "resources" for owner occupiers and tenants. They have subsequently been consulted on a draft direction and associated guidance on the test of resources for landlords. Once their comments have been received and considered we will finalise the regulations and circulars relating to part VIII for issue as soon as possible thereafter.

Council House Sales

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on how many dwellings each local authority has sold under the right-to-buy legislation or voluntarily since April 1979; and what percentage of the total local authority stock they represent.

Mr. Chope: I have placed in the Library a table giving available information on local authority sales up to December 1989. It shows year by year information for each authority since 1984-85 together with cumulative figures since April 1979 and the proportion of their stock sold since April 1979.

French Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the volume of irradiated material and the scale of pollution from radioactive discharges which entered British coastal waters from the nuclear power stations on or near the northern coast of France during 1989.

Mr. Trippier: A programme of regular and extensive monitoring of the marine environment around the United Kingdom coastline is carried out by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It is not possible to estimate the amount of irradiated material from overseas nuclear installations within the low levels of radioactivity measured in United Kingdom coastal waters.

Nuclear Waste

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much is being spent by Nirex in the current financial year on research into the safe disposal of nuclear waste; and how much money is being spent (a) in the United States and (b) Sweden on similar work in this financial year.

Mr. Trippier: I understand that Nirex's estimated expenditure for this financial year on research and development work towards a deep disposal facility for low and intermediate-level radioactive waste is £13·9 million. The Department does not have any information about expenditure on such research in the United States or Sweden.

Encapsulation Plants, Sellafield

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the projected timetable for intermediate-level waste encapsulation at Sellafield for each of the encapsulation plants.

Mr. Trippier: There are three intermediate-level waste encapsulation plants currently under construction at Sellafield. One will be operational later this year; the others are expected to be commissioned in 1992.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the level of expenditure by his Department on research into the safety of (a) intermediate and (b) low-level nuclear waste disposal for each year from 1970 to 1990, inclusive; and what are the projected figures to 1999;

(2) what was the level of expenditure by his Department on research into the safety of high-level nuclear waste disposal for each year from 1970 to 1990, inclusive; and what are the projected figures to 1999.

Mr. Trippier: My Department announced in 1977 that it would be assuming overall responsibility for radioactive waste management policy and in 1978-79 a full programme of research commenced under DOE control. Our wide-ranging research programme produces long-term benefits for the safe disposal of all levels of radioactive waste. It is not therefore practicable to divide the costs in the way requested. The level of expenditure by my Department on radioactive waste management research at actual prices for each financial year has been as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	3·3
1979-80	5·1
1980-81	9·7
1981-82	8·5
1982-83	9·8
1983-84	8·5
1984-85	9·6
1985-86	10·6
1986-87	11·4
1987-88	10·2
1988-89	8·8
1989-90	10·8

It is envisaged that current levels of expenditure are likely to be maintained broadly until the end of the century.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether there are any plans to build a nuclear waste repository under the seabed.

Mr. Trippier: The United Kingdom has no such plans.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the table 3.2b on pages 3 to 11 of the United Kingdom radioactive waste inventory (DOE/RW 188.061) entitled "Conditioned Waste Volumes Classed According to Waste Category: Waste from Committed Sources" includes waste arising from British Nuclear Fuels plc. from uncommitted reactors which are not currently in existence, under construction or required in future for currently approved programmes.

Mr. Trippier: The uncommitted arisings are from the operations of the THORP plant at Sellafield following major maintenance after its first 10 years or so of operation. At the time the inventory was compiled, these were included with the committed arisings on the basis that THORP itself was committed.

Mortgages

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to meet building society representatives and other mortgage lending institutions to discuss their approaches to rescheduling loans and repossession.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Ministers and officials at the Department of the Environment frequently meet representatives from mortgage lending institutions and discuss a range of issues, including mortgage arrears and possessions. I have met recently with representatives of the Council of Mortgage Lenders, whose members include all building societies of any size and many other mortgage lending institutions.

Rented Property

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department keeps an index of housing costs for those living in rented accommodation.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith).

Chatham and Medway Docks

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who are the consultants who have been employed to assist with the Chatham and Medway docks redevelopment project.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

This is a matter for the boards of English Estates and the Chatham Historic Dockyard Trust.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Household Incomes

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average weekly household income in £ sterling as a percentage of total household income for the Yorkshire and Humberside region for 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Estimates of gross average weekly household income for the United Kingdom and the Yorkshire and Humberside region are published in table 58 of the 1979 family expenditure survey report and in table 31 of the 1983, 1987 and 1988 reports, copies of which are in the Library.

European Community (Contribution)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the United Kingdom gross and net contribution to the European Community for each of the years for which figures are available at standard prices (a) for all contributions and (b) for contributions towards agricultural spending.

Mr. Ryder: The United Kingdom's total gross and net contributions, in constant 1989 prices, are set out in the table. The United Kingdom's contribution to the EC budget is towards the cost of total EC expenditure and not towards any particular element such as agriculture.

Gross and net payments to the EC budget

£ million[1]

Year	Gross (before receipts and refunds or abatements)	Net (after receipts and refunds or abatements)
1973	909	512
1974	784	127
1975	1,177	−193
1976	1,385	499
1977	1,932	968
1978	3,177	1,937
1979	3,306	1,949
1980	3,044	1,216
1981	3,365	614
1982	4,116	871
1983	4,061	883
1984	4,178	856
1985	4,866	2,233
1986	5,361	683
1987	5,916	1,957
1988	5,484	1,454
1989	5,533	1,966

[1] Constant prices have been constructed using the GDP deflator at market prices.

EC Agriculture Spending

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of European Community spending was on agriculture in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Ryder: For the years 1980 to 1988 the information requested is given in table 16 of successive reports by the Court of Auditors. In 1989 and 1990, provision for agricultural guarantee expenditure accounted for 59·6 and 56·6 per cent. respectively of the total budget.

Natural Beauty Products

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has anything to add to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, column 423, concerning companies forced into receivership by Customs and Excise action, in respect of the Natural Beauty Products Company of Bridgend.

Mr. Ryder: The company was not put into receivership by Customs and Excise action. The administrative receiver appointed by the debenture holder for Natural Beauty Products of Bridgend is trying to sell the company as a going concern.

Internal Audit

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the subject of the internal audit report that was drawn to the attention of a Minister in his Department in 1989.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The subject of the audit report concerned trade statistics in respect of diamond imports and exports.

Balance of Payments

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the nature of the expenditure and income covered by the £4,727 million deficit dealt with in the page of statistics entitled transfers on the balance of payments figures issued by the Central Statistical Office on 13 March.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The coverages of the various categories of expenditure and income are explained on page 39 of the 1989 edition of "United Kingdom Balance of Payments", a copy of which is in the Library.

Hong Kong (Investment)

Mr. Janman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the size of British investment in Hong Kong expressed as a percentage of national gross domestic product at factor cost.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 21 March 1990]: Information is available only on the book value of United Kingdom direct investment in Hong Kong which, at £1,924 million at end-1987, represented 0·5 per cent. of United Kingdom gross domestic product at factor cost (in current prices) in 1987. Direct investment is only one aspect of the United Kingdom's extensive commercial involvement in Hong Kong. The total value of the United Kingdom stake in Hong Kong is likely to be substantially greater than the figure for direct investment alone.

TRANSPORT

Driving Licences

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many new full driving licences have been issued by the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in each of the last three years, exclusive of heavy goods vehicle licences and public service vehicle licences.

Mr. Atkins: The number of new full driving licences issued by the driver and vehicle licensing centre in the last three years, are as follows:

	New licences
1987	991,769
1988	1,000,611
1989	1,004,358

These figures do not include replacement, duplicate and exchange licences issued to people who have already held a full British driving licence.

M40 (Gerrards Cross)

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the current traffic flows, by volume, density and mix, on the M40 at Gerrards Cross.

Mr. Atkins: The latest annual average daily traffic flows recorded, for 1988, were:

	Vehicles	Per cent
Cars	63,000	84
Buses	600	1
Light Goods Vehicles	5,400	7
Heavy Goods Vehicles	6,000	8
Total	75,000	100

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the total amount of gross compensation paid under the Land Compensation Act 1973 in connection with the construction of the Gerrards Cross bypass (M40).

Mr. Atkins: Payments under part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973 for this length of M40 total £1·259 million.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received regarding the Channel tunnel and midland main line railway; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: I have received a number of representations about the Channel tunnel and the midland mainline. The extent to which this line is used for Channel tunnel rail services is a matter for BR's commercial judgment. It is also for British Rail in the first instance to decide whether it is in its commercial interest to propose electrification of this or any other line. The board's proposals for an international station at King's Cross would provide excellent interchange facilities with inter-city services on the midland mainline.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Public Expenditure Commentary

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to publish the Northern Ireland public expenditure commentary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: The "Northern Ireland Commentary on Public Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93" was published today and copies are available in the Vote Office. This is the third Northern Ireland commentary and it aims to improve the information available to Parliament, and the public, by amplifying the material in the Northern Ireland chapter of the 1990 public expenditure White Paper.

Higher Education

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students from the Irish Republic are at (a) universities and (b) other higher education establishments in Northern Ireland; and what have been the numbers for each of the last four years.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Provisional information for the 1989-90 academic year is

(a). at universities—1,478

(b). at other higher education establishments—24

Comparable information for each of the last four years is:

	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89
(a) at universities	436	613	931	1,219
(b) at other higher education establishments	14	16	14	20

New Building Units

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the number of new building units which will be built in 1990-91 in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: It is estimated that during 1990-91 building will commence on the following units:

	Units
(a) The private sector (including housing associations)	7,000
(b) The public sector (Northern Ireland Housing Executive)	1,000

Salmon

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how long the dealer licensing scheme for the purchase of Atlantic salmon has been in operation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The system, which was first provided for in the Fisheries Act (NI) 1928, has operated in its present form since the introduction of the Fisheries Act (NI) 1966.

Marine Research

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether a cost benefit analysis was carried out by the Department of Agriculture (a) before an undertaking to operate the research vessel Lough Foyle was entered into, (b) before or (c) after a decision was taken to seek funding for the vessel; and what are the benefits which justified the commitment.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Yes to (a) and (b).

The benefits will derive from improved long-term management of exploitable marine stocks with the objective of providing enhanced yields in order to sustain a viable Northern Ireland sea fishing industry. Additional R and D will enhance scientific knowledge of complex interactions in the marine ecosystem and environment.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) part-time and (b) short term contract scientific staff have been appointed to new scientific posts created to work on the research vessel Lough Foyle.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: No part-time or short-term contract scientific staff have yet been appointed. A total of 13 non-scientific staff for crewing the vessel are being employed through an agency agreement with the private sector.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many permanent staff have been appointed to the new scientific posts created to work on the research vessel Lough Foyle.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: In 1989-90 one scientist, at grade 6, was appointed. A further 11 permanent and one temporary scientific staff are currently being recruited.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what analysis of the costs of berthing the research vessel Lough Foyle was carried out; whether (a) Coleraine port and (b) Londonderry port were considered and costed; what are the financial benefits per year in favour of Belfast since the vessel came into service; and what are the projections for the next three years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Berthing costs are insignificant in terms of the overall costs of the vessel. The overriding factor is the cost of fuel to reach the target sea areas requiring R and D and monitoring. Londonderry and Coleraine are, therefore, not appropriate ports.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any estimate has been made of the replacement cost of the research vessel Lough Foyle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Replacement of the vessel has not yet been considered. A review will take place when appropriate taking into consideration policy and scientific needs.

Freddie Andrews

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to assess whether Freddie Andrews enjoys the standard of living intended by his father and benefits appropriately from his properties disposed of by the Official Solicitor to John Laing Developments Ltd.

The Attorney-General: I have been asked to reply.

As I said in my most recent reply to the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs), Official Report, 12 December 1989, columns 548-49, it is not appropriate to publish details of the affairs of any patient without the leave of the court.

An application may be made to the court by any person concerned about a particular case for disclosure of any information in respect of which the applicant can demonstrate a legitimate interest.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest position regarding getting relief supplies to those who need them in Ethiopia.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in the light of serious famine forecast for April, he has proposals to grant further food aid to Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Following my visit to Ethiopia on 9 and 10 March, I announced a further £8·5 million contribution of food and other emergency aid. Following the effective closure of the port of Massawa to relief operations, it is now unlikely that famine can be wholly averted.

The agreement on the movement of relief supplies into northern Welo and Tigray along the so-called southern line from the port of Assab was a most welcome development. President Mengistu assured me that the Government would not hinder this operation and the rebel side has also agreed to it.

The first convoys moved across the lines on 20 and 21 March and reached the distribution centre of Kobo in northern Welo the following day.

Rain Forests

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the financial aspects of the agreement with Brazil on rain forest issues, arranged during the visit of the right hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten).

Mrs. Chalker: Our programme of rain forest and other environmental assistance to Brazil will represent additional aid for that country, financed from the new £100 million for ODA's tropical forestry activities announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the United Nations last November.

The level of assistance for Brazil is not fixed and will depend on the number of projects which can be agreed. The first project agreed under the memorandum of understanding, for climate-related research, is expected to cost some £2·5 million.

Namibia

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about how British aid to Namibia is to be spent.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer my hon. Friend to my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby on 21 March, Official Report, column 612.

Namibia

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how much bilateral and multilateral aid he has given in the last two years to assist Namibians in English language teaching and training inside and outside Namibia;

(2) what steps he has taken to assist in the establishment of English as the lingua franca of Namibia;

(3) whether he is planning to aid the Namibian Academy in its English language teaching projects.

Mrs. Chalker: Over the last two years we have provided over £1 million in bilateral aid to assist Namibians in English language teaching and training. Most of this has been for training awards in Britain for Namibian teachers of English and for assistance to exile education institutions including the United Nations Institute for Namibia in Lusaka. It has included the preparation of teaching materials in English for use in Namibia's schools. Figures are not readily available for our share of multilateral aid for this purpose.

Under article three of Namibia's constitution, English is declared the official language of Namibia. We are already financing an English language adviser to the Minister of Education in Windhoek and will provide the course director for the first English language teaching course at the proposed National Institute of Languages. VSO will provide three teachers for this course. A British consultant arrived in Namibia today to advise on Namibia's education system. It is too early to say whether we will provide assistance to English language teaching projects run by the academy; much will depend on the Government's decisions on the academy's future role.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure of his Department and the Lord Chancellor's Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

The Attorney-General: No publicity or advertising expenditure was incurred by my Department in 1979. At that time the Crown prosecution service and the Serious Fraud Office did not exist. In 1989-90, expenditure of £36,443 on publicity and £1,217 on advertising was incurred by the Treasury Solicitor's department. In that period, the Crown prosecution service incurred expenditure of £144,466 on publicity and £268,857 on advertising, and the Serious Fraud Office incurred an expenditure of £9,782 on advertising.

The estimated figures for the Lord Chancellor's Department and for the public bodies for which it has responsibility for 1989-90, excluding staff costs are as follows:

	Publicity £	Advertising £
LCD (and Associated Offices)	39,021	16,541
Legal Aid Board	105,000	25,000

The amounts spent for 1979 can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Bophuthatswana

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Attorney-General what discussions he has had on the public relations representation in the United Kingdom for Bophuthatswana; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: An allegation made in April 1986 on behalf of the Government of Bophuthatswana that funds had been misappropriated from a bank account belonging to the Bophuthatswana National Commercial Corporation Limited was referred to the metropolitan and city fraud squad. Following a police investigation, the Director of the Serious Fraud Office concluded in April 1988 that insufficient evidence was available to justify the institution of proceedings against any person. I had no discussion on the matter but was notified of that decision.

Land Registry

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make it his policy to investigate the feasibility of enabling private tenants of mortgaged property the right to register an interest on the Land Registry.

The Attorney-General: In its third report on land registration (Law Commission No. 158) the Law Commission, having extensively reviewed the matter, recommended no change to the existing requirement that only leases for a term exceeding 21 years should be capable of being noted on registered titles. The Government are considering this recommendation together with others listed in the report.

WALES

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the community charge for 1990-91 of (a) each district council and (b) each county council in Wales; and if he will show the relationship to the standard spending assessment for each of those councils.

Mr. Grist: Local authorities in Wales are in the process of submitting information to the Welsh Office relating to community charges. I shall write to my hon. Friend with the information he has requested when all the returns have been received and checked.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide the rate that would have had to have been levied as the equivalent of the community charge for 1990-91 of (a) each district council and (b) each county council in Wales; and if he will show the increase each of those rates are over the rates for those same councils for 1989-90.

Mr. Grist: I shall write to my hon. Friend and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount collected in business rates (a) in Wales and (b) in each local authority in Wales in 1988-89; what is the amount projected to be collected in 1989-90; and what are the estimates for 1990-91 to 1994-95.

Mr. Grist: Estimates of business rate yield by local authority are available centrally only for 1990-91 as shown in the table. Information is not available for 1991-92 to 1994-95.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what minimum residence period in a financial year has been established by the community charge registration officer for the payment of poll tax in each local authority for people with a residence but who normally work abroad for most of the year.

Mr. Peter Walker: A person is subject to a charging authority's personal community charge on a given day if he or she has their sole or main residence in the charging authority's area on that day. The decision as to whether, on any day, a residence constitutes a sole or main residence is a matter for each community charges registration officer (CCRO) to decide on the facts of the individual case. Information about community charges registration officers's decisions is not held centrally.

Council House Rents

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to limit council house rents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: None.

Improvement Grants

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many home improvement grants have been given (a) in general and (b) specifically to households in order to replace lead plumbing in each district, borough and city council area for each year since 1985.

Mr. Grist: The total number of completed home improvement grants is given in the table. Data on the number of grants specifically given in order to replace lead plumbing is not collected centrally.

Tap Water

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many households in each district, borough and city council area in Wales have tap water which is above (a) 100 micrograms of lead per litre concentration and (b) 50 micrograms per litre; and what were the figures for each year from 1985 to 1989.

Mr. Grist: This information is not available. However, Dwr Cymru has confirmed that the water that it supplies complies with the lead standard in the EC directive relating to the quality of water for human consumption (80/778/EEC).

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many tests were carried out on tap water standards in district, borough and city council area in Wales to locate the (a) lead, (b) aluminium, (c) pesticides, (d) nitrates and (e) trihalomenthanes in each year from 1985 to 1989.

Mr. Grist: This information is not held centrally and I refer the hon. Gentleman to the chairman of the respective water undertakers and to the environmental health officers of local authorities.

The Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 (SI 1989 No. 1147) contain requirements about the frequency of sampling by water undertakers. So far as local authorities are concerned, sampling frequencies relating to public supplies are a matter for the authorities' discretion. Advice on the frequency of sampling by authorities of private supplies is contained in WO circular 51/84.

Water undertakers are required by regulation 29(1)(f) and 30(1) to maintain a public register of the results of all analyses. Regulation 31 requires that all undertakers prepare and publish an annual report of water quality.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for levels of lead in tap water in drinking water at hospitals in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Information about levels of lead in tap water in drinking water at hospitals is not collected by the Welsh Office or by district health authorities.

Almost without exception, hospitals in Wales use water supplied by water undertakers. It is, in the first instance, for the companies themselves to ensure that the water they supply for domestic purposes—including supplies to hospitals—is wholesome. The sampling regime to be followed by the companies is prescribed by the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 (SI 1989, No. 1147).

Local authorities also are under a duty to monitor public supplies and are required to ensure that private water supplies in their areas are wholesome.

Oil Spill (Severn)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what steps have been taken to clean up the oil spilled into the river Severn on 1 March 1990; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what impact the oil spilled into the river Severn on 1 March 1990 will have on the surrounding environment and wildlife, especially migratory birds returning to Wales for the summer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: We are advised by the National Rivers Authority that the majority of the oil spilled was contained on site and removed by the company concerned. Inspections of the river Severn have shown only very minor contamination and there were no adverse effects on water quality. There has been some contamination of vegetation on the river banks. The spillage occurred before the return of migratory birds, but the authority has taken steps to minimise any effect on endemic and migratory wildlife.

Myodil Dye

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will undertake a full investigation into the side-effects on patients in Wales resulting from the use of myodil; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

DEFENCE

Air-Sea Rescue

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is planned to continue the Royal Air Force long-distance air-sea rescue capability when the Nimrod fleet is phased out.

Mr. Neubert: Yes.

Atomic Weapons Establishments

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on visits by hon. Members to atomic weapons establishments; if the normal facilities are provided for such visits to establishments in hon. Members' constituencies or where constituents are employed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: All visits to defence establishments, including the atomic weapons establishment, by Members of Parliament are subject to prior approval by Ministers.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any assessment of the economic and industrial implications of a reduction in the declared production of 250 European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. As I said in my reply to the hon. Gentleman on 15 January 1990 at column 125, there has been no change in the United Kingdom's declared production offtake of 250 aircraft. It is too early to forecast with certainty the eventual size of the United Kingdom purchase of EFA.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Departmental Budget

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the budget of his Department for 1989-90; what are the principal items on which it is spent; and how many staff are employed.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The estimated cost of my private office in the year 1989-90 is £56,342. The principal items of expenditure are salaries for the one and a half staff employed in my office, and provision of a secure Government car service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

New Parliamentary Building

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Lord President of the Council if the plans for the new parliamentary building in Bridge street include a creche.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take urgent steps to establish a workplace nursery in the House of Commons for use by staff working for Members of the House.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Positive resolutions in relation to the principle of providing child care facilities for the children of Members and all staff in the House have already been taken by the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee. Hitherto, it had been envisaged that those facilities could be provided only in phase 2 of the new parliamentary buildings or by participating in appropriate schemes set up by Government Departments. Recent developments in analysing the use of accommodation in the House may well, however, provide a fresh opportunity for reconsideration. The House of Commons Commission has therefore invited the Services Committee to look again at this matter.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Audit Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his reply of 18 January, Official Report, column 355, if he will provide a list of the general issues relating to audit which his Department has referred to the accountancy bodies.

Mr. Redwood: The topics raised with the leading accountancy bodies and subsequently publicised in the professional press were:

(i) accounts not in statutory format
(ii) unwarranted filing of modified accounts
(iii) accounts not filed by due date
(iv) auditors acting as company secretary
(v) depreciation of fixed assets.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many auditing partners have been barred from practising as a result of critical reports by his inspectors.

Mr. Redwood: It is the responsibility of the professional accountancy bodies and the joint disciplinary scheme (JDS) to investigate complaints and take such action as is appropriate. As far as I am aware, there has been no occasion where criticism of a company's auditors by my Department's inspectors in reports published since June 1979 has led to an audit partner being excluded from membership of a professional accountancy body. However, there have been two instances where accountants who were directors of the companies criticised by inspectors were investigated by JDS and subsequently excluded from membership of their professional body.

Ferranti (Alleged Fraud)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the nature of the response of his Department to the alleged fraud at Ferranti; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The Serious Fraud Office and the company fraud department of the Metropolitan police are actively investigating allegations of fraud prior to, surrounding and subsequent to the merger of Ferranti plc and International Signal and Control Group plc. They will take action if that is necessary following investigation.

North East Shipbuilders Ltd.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will indicate to Sir Leon Brittan that Her Majesty's Government have no objection to his discussing the details of the notification by Her Majesty's Government concerning the closure of North East Shipbuilders Ltd with the Member of the European Parliament for Tyne and Wear;

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of the formal notification made by Her Majesty's Government to the European Commission regarding the closure of North East Shipbuilders Ltd.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No.

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on which days Her Majesty's Government formally notified the European Commission of their proposals regarding the closure of North East Shipbuilders Ltd. and related matters; and on which day the European Commission formally notified their acceptance of these proposals.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government formally notified to the Commission of the European Community on 9 December 1988 a number of aspects relating to British Shipbuilders, including the proposed terms of sale of a number of subsidiary companies and the payment of closure aid at North East Shipbuilders Ltd. The Commission decided on 21 December not to raise objections to the matters covered by this notification.

Contracts (Moral Rights)

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to bring forward legislation to amend the Copyright Designs and Patents Act 1988 so as to render unlawful contracts in which a writer has to waive his or her moral rights.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have no such plans, since I believe that it is important to preserve freedom of contract in dealings involving copyright.

Domestic Fixed Capital Expenditure

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total domestic fixed capital expenditure in the Yorkshire and Humberside region for 1979, 1983, 1987 and the most recent year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: I have been asked to reply.

Figures representing the total investment in Yorkshire and Humberside are not available. Estimates are made, however, of gross domestic fixed capital formation by general government and by selected industries. These estimates represent the expenditure on fixed assets, that is, on replacement or addition to the stock of fixed assets and so exclude expenditure on maintenance and repairs. Figures for Government expenditure are £346 million in 1979, £465 million in 1983 and £606 million in 1987. Figures for industry expenditure in these three years are respectively £1,981 million, £2,385 million and £3,288 million (1987 is the latest year for which estimates have been made). The industries covered are agriculture, forestry, fishing, energy, water supply, manufacturing, transport and communications excluding air and sea transport and dwellings. Estimates are not available for the service industries. There is some overlap between the general government and industry figures since they both cover dwellings.

Cot Mattresses (Chemical Hazard)

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department first knew of biochemist Barry Richardson's work on the possible dangers of young babies from chemicals used in fire resistant mattresses and any link with cot death syndrome.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: I have been asked to reply.

Mr. Richardson's work was first drawn to our attention by Mr. Mitchell in January 1989. In April 1989 we received further details of the hypothesis that fungal action on mattresses emitted toxic gases which were a possible explanation for sudden infant deaths. The laboratory of the Government Chemist was then asked to conduct a scientific assessment of the hypothesis. I understand that it has not, as yet, been able to confirm Mr. Richardson's findings. Its results are being referred to the group of experts which, as the hon. Member will know, the chief medical officer has invited to assess Mr. Richardson's work.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Angola

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to support President Mobutu's work as mediator in the continuing Angolan civil war between UNITA and the MPLA.

Mr. Waldegrave: The breakdown of the ceasefire arranged by President Mobutu in June 1989 has frustrated his mediation efforts. We have urged both sides to renew the ceasefire and enter into negotiations on a political settlement.

Cyprus

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the demographic mix of the population of Northern Cyprus as between Turkish settlers and indigenous Turkish Cypriots.

Mr. Maude: Turkish Cypriot statistics show a total population in 1989 of 169,272. This figure is not broken down. Estimates for Turkish settlers tend to be in the range of 40,000 to 45,000, although higher figures have been quoted.

Libya

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek information from the German Democratic Republic Government on their future intentions relating to technical support for the Libyan military.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our policy remains clear. We have no military links with Libya.

We look forward to discussions with representatives of the new GDR Government when it is formed.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the current situation in Libya; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our information on Libya has been limited since diplomatic relations were broken in 1984. I shall be glad to write to my hon. Friend if he has a particular matter in mind.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking through the United Nations and the European Economic Community to encourage the German Democratic Republic Government to cease all technical support for the Libyan military.

Mr. Waldegrave: Our policy remains clear. We have no military links with Libya. In 1986 the European Community agreed measures against Libya which included an arms embargo. This is still in force.

We look forward to discussions with representatives of the new GDR Government when it is formed.

Know-How Fund

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which countries are now receiving help from the know-how fund; and if it is to be extended further in the near future.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced during President Havel's visit last week that the know-how fund is being extended to Czecholosvakia. Poland and Hungary are already beneficiaries and we have said other countries will qualify once they are fully committed to political and economic reform.

Namibia

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during his recent visit to Namibia, he discussed with Ministers or officers of the new Government (i) the possibility of Namibia joining the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, (ii) the provision of unsafeguarded uranium for the United Kingdom stockpile and (iii) the continued provision of mineral resources to the United Kingdom from Namibian sources.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs discussed the possibility of Namibia joining the nuclear non-proliferation treaty with President Nujoma; he did not discuss the other two subjects mentioned in the question.

South Africa

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during his recent visit to South Africa, he raised with Ministers or officials of the Government of the Republic of the prospects of South Africa joining the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Waldegrave: This subject was touched on briefly in the discussions that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs had with the South African Administration.

EC-ACP Meeting

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the agenda of the EC-ACP meeting in Fiji on 28 and 29 March.

Mr. Maude: The ACP-EC Council of Ministers meeting in Fiji on 28 and 29 March will discuss:

The state of implementation of the third Lomé convention.
Transitional measures between the third and fourth Lomé conventions.
Trade and customs co-operation.
Commodities.
Stabex (assistance for loss of export earnings from certain agricultural products).
Sysmin (assistance for loss of export earnings from certain minerals).
Sugar.

Development finance co-operation.
Industrial Co-operation.
Agricultural co-operation.
Treatment of ACP nationals in EEC member states.
The ACP-EC joint assembly.
Southern Africa.
The single European Market.
Developments in Eastern Europe and their implications for ACP-EC co-operation.
ACP states' indebtedness.

Council of Europe

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what decisions were taken at the enlarged meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Council of Europe in Lisbon on 23 and 24 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: A special session of the committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in Lisbon on 23 and 24 March discussed the Council's relations with central and eastern Europe. The United Kingdom was represented by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The conclusions of the meeting were wide ranging: a copy of a summary from the committee's chairman, the Foreign Minister of Portugal, has been placed in the Library. We will of course participate fully in the follow-up envisaged by the chairman's summary.

Cambodia

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on British Government policy towards Cambodia.

Mr. Hurd: Since my written reply to the question from my hon. Friend on 8 November 1989, we have continued to work for a sovereign and independent Cambodia whose people are able to live in safety and prosperity and free to decide their own future. Our abhorrence of the Khmer Rouge remains absolute, and we are doing what we can to prevent Pol Pot and his friends from returning to power.

We are making good progress in building up our humanitarian aid programme, which is designed to help both Cambodians in Cambodia and those who have taken refuge in camps along the Thai border. In December 1989, two British officials visited Cambodia to examine at first hand the scope for British aid. Following this, we pledged an additional £1 million to multilateral agencies for their programmes inside Cambodia. We are also supporting eight projects inside Cambodia sponsored by non-governmental organisations, with a total commitment of £224,000, and are considering six new applications with a total value of £500,000.

In addition to this important humanitarian effort, we are actively working for a peaceful, comprehensive political settlement in Cambodia. We welcomed the proposal by the Australian Foreign Minister for a special role for the United Nations. A series of meetings of the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council has agreed the principles which should underlie a settlement. These include an enhanced role for the United Nations, the modalities of a peace-keeping effort in Cambodia, and the administrative structure during the interim period of United Nations involvement. The informal meeting on Cambodia in Jakarta on 26 to 28 February achieved some further progress on United Nations involvement, although it also demonstrated the important remaining differences between the parties.

I have discussed Cambodia with other Foreign Ministers, including those of the United States, France and Italy. I also had a meeting with the United Nations Secretary General in New York in February. Foreign Ministers of the 12 member states of the European Community issued a statement on Cambodia on 20 February, and Cambodia figured prominently in the discussions and joint declaration of the EC-ASEAN ministerial meeting in Malaysia in February.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Negotiating Rights

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the International Labour Organisation indicated that it was satisfied with what he was currently doing about the restoration of teachers' negotiating rights, as he stated before the Select Committee on Education, Science and the Arts, on 28 November 1989 (HC 32-i, page 3).

Mrs. Rumbold: The position is that the ILO is aware of the steps the Government are taking to put in place new and lasting pay determination machinery and has not asked us to proceed on any other timetable.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list those years in the period 1974 to 1989 when financial cuts in real terms were made in public expenditure on education in England and Wales;

(2) if he will list those years in the period 1974 to 1989 when financial cuts in real terms were made in public expenditure on education in England and Wales.

Mrs. Rumbold: Public expenditure on education in England and Wales fell in real terms (as measured by the GDP deflator) in the following financial years in the period referred to:

1974-75; 1978-79; 1979-80; 1981-82; 1984-85; 1985-86.

Universities Funding Council

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many of his Department's staff and at what grades have been seconded to work for the Universities Funding Council.

Mr. MacGregor: There are 58 staff on secondment to the Universities Funding Council in the following grades:

	Staff
Grade 3	1
Grade 5	1
Grade 6	1
Grade 7	6
HEO	13
EO	10
AO	10
AA	2
Secretaries	5
Typing manager	1
Typists	4
Support staff	4
TOTAL	58

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many staff, at what grades, and what proportion of the total, have resigned or are intending to resign from the employment of the Universities Funding Council in consequence of (a) its move to Bristol and (b) for other reasons.

Mr. MacGregor: None. All staff directly employed by the council are prepared to move to Bristol. Those on secondment at EO level and above who will be under age 57 at the time of relocation will be asked whether they wish to become employees of the council and move to Bristol. All staff aged 57 and over and those at AO level and below will return to their employers.

Teacher Training (Bursaries)

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, in respect of initial teacher training in subjects for which bursaries have been made available, he will list for each subject and each year for which a bursary scheme has operated, the number of applicants, the number of acceptances, the target for the subject, the amount of bursary and its total cost, and the proportion of students accepted for each course who completed their qualification, and the proportion who obtained employment in a maintained school, with aggregate totals for each year.

Mr. MacGregor: An evaluation commissioned from Bath university showed that in 1988, 83 per cent. of bursary holders went on to teach in maintained secondary schools, a higher proportion than the generality of ITT students. This finding is corroborated by evidence from a DES survey of bursary holders. It is not possible to disaggregate bursary holders from the total of students completing initial teacher training qualifications.

Table 1 shows the number of applications, recruitment targets, recruitment figures and total expenditure by subject and year.

Table 2 shows the amount of bursary by subject and year.

Since its institution, the bursary and the subjects covered have developed as follows:

Table 2

Subjects eligible	Year	Level £
Maths, Physics, CDT	1986	1,200
Maths, Physics, CDT, Technology	1987	1,250
Maths, Physics, CDT, Technology	1988	[1]1,300

[1] + £200 CDT Equipment.

"Technology" was added on legal advice so as to include courses entitled "Technology" which prepare students to teach other bursary subjects up to GCSE standard.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he has taken to monitor the effectiveness of the bursary schemes to attract student teachers to train in shortage subjects and to enter employment in the maintained sector; and what are the conclusions of such measures.

Mr. MacGregor: Research commissioned by my Department from the University of Bath school of education concluded that the bursary scheme had made an important contribution to attracting good quality students into shortage subject courses. At the time of the survey 83 per cent. of bursary holders had gone on to teach in maintained secondary schools, a higher proportion than the generality of newly trained teachers, Others were teaching in the independent sector or working in other posts connected with education. An increasing proportion of students had said that they could not have taken the course without a bursary, which helps to demonstrate the value of the scheme in attracting mature entrants to teaching.

Assisted Places

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average tuition fee charged by schools within the assisted places scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: The average tuition fee charged by schools in England within the assisted places scheme in academic year 1988-89, the latest year for which final figures are available, was £2,591.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated total expenditure on assisted places in 1990-91, and in respect of how many pupils.

Mr. MacGregor: It is estimated that total expenditure on assisted places in England in the financial year 1990-91 will be £61,926,000. Thirty three thousand, two hundred and eighty eight assisted places will be available in England in the academic year 1990-91.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which school within the assisted places scheme charges the highest tuition fees; and what is the amount of that fee.

Mr. MacGregor: Charterhouse school, Godalming, where the academic year 1989-90 annual tuition fee is £6,975.

Pre-primary Education

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimate of the number of children currently receiving nursery and other forms of pre-primary education.

Mrs. Rumbold: A total of 548,000 under-fives were attending maintained nursery and primary schools in England in January 1989. This was an increase of 15,000 over the previous year and an increase of 119,000 since 1980. During the decade the age participation rate increased from 39 to 45 per cent. A further 42,000 (3 per cent. of the age group) were attending nursery units in independent schools. The Department does not collect information on other forms of pre-primary education.

School Closures

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will update the table in the answer to the hon. Member for Blackburn, of 29 June 1989, Official Report, columns 535-36, on school closures, to give information for the calendar year 1989, and the latest information available for 1990.

Mr. MacGregor: The information is in the following updated table:

Further Education (Liverpool)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the assistant director for further education in Liverpool; what subjects were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Officials of the Department met the senior assistant director (further education) of Liverpool local authority, together with the assistant city solicitor, on 21 March. His purpose in requesting the meeting was, in accordance with a resolution of Liverpool city council, to advise the Department of the council's decision to recommend to its education committee that the management of its further education provision be restructured by 1 April 1991 to a single college model on various sites throughout the city.

Student Loans

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the repayment terms of top-up for students on longer courses.

Mr. MacGregor: I am now able to announce that the Government intend that the repayment period for students on courses that are longer than four years should be initially seven years. The standard repayment period for other students will be initially five years. This will ensure that repayments are manageable for students on courses longer than four years, who will build up larger liabilities during their courses. As the scheme develops and loans increase in real terms the standard repayment period will be extended: the repayment period for those on longer courses will similarly be extended.

Access Funds

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will review the provision for access funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I am now able to announce that following parliamentary discussion during the various stages of the Education (Student Loans) Bill in both Houses, the Government have decided to increase to £20 million the access funds available for higher education. This will give the higher education institutions greater scope for extending discretionary assistance on a flexible basis to their students, notably those facing relatively high accommodation.

The necessary supplementary estimates approval for the additional expenditure of £10 million in 1990-91 will be sought in due course.

Pensions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the average pension paid to head teachers who retired in 1989; and what was the average pension received by head teachers who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(2) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by lecturers in higher education on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(3) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by lecturers in further education on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(4) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by teachers on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(5) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by head teachers on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(6) what was the average pension paid for lecturers in higher education who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension currently received by lecturers in higher education in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(7) what was the average pension paid to lecturers in further education who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension received by lecturers in further education who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(8) what was the average pension paid to teachers who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension currently received by teachers who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969.

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Information in respect of 1989 is being assembled and will be made available shortly; information relating to lecturers in higher education and further education is only held as a combined total. Figures for 1969 and 1979 are as follows:

Average pension at time of payment

	1969 £	1979 £
Teachers	695	2,270
Head teachers	1,080	3,560
Lecturers	985	2,770

Average pension at current values

	1969[1] £	1979[1] £
Teachers	4,450	4,380
Head teachers	6,910	6,860
Lecturers	6,300	5,340

[1] Retirement.

In 1969, teachers generally required 30 years service before being eligible for a pension; the average length of service on which pensions were based in 1969 was 33 years. The present qualifying period for a pension is two years and the average length of service on which pensions are currently based is 26 years.

SCOTLAND

Footpaths and Bridleways

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, for each of the years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989, the number of temporary traffic regulation orders made by local authorities under section 14 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to restrict or prohibit the use of footpaths or bridleways for which he gave consent under section 15(2) of that Act for an extension of the period for which the order was in force.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Temporary traffic orders affecting footpaths and bridleways are not separately identified from those affecting road traffic and the information could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Cash Limits

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to make further changes to the cash limits for 1989-90 within his responsibility.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. I intend to make changes to four of the cash limits within my responsibility.

As a result of savings on various grant schemes the cash limit for class XVI, vote 2, agriculture services and fisheries, Scotland, will be decreased by £1,000,000 from £80,024,000 to £79,024,000.

The cash limit on class XVI, vote 3, regional and general industrial support, Scotland will be reduced by £750,000 from £144,249,000 to £143,499,000. This reflects a reduction to the Scottish Development Agency's grant in aid associated with additional receipts arising from property sales by the agency.

The cash limit on class XVI, vote 6, roads, transport and environmental services, Scotland, will be decreased by £1,500,000 from £212,942,000 to £211,442,000 as a result of savings on trunk road maintenance expenditure.

The non-voted cash limit SO/LA2, which covers housing capital expenditure by local authorities and new towns, will be reduced by £3,037,000 from £344,286,000 to £341,249,000 reflecting savings on expenditure by the new towns.

Training Schemes

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list private companies involved with provision of youth training schemes and employment training in Scotland by regional area; and how expenditure of public money by them is monitored.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 7 March 1990]: Financial checks on all training providers in YTS and employment training are carried out by the Training Agency's professional accountant in Scotland.

All organisations operating YTS must have approved training organisation status, and all organisations operating employment training must achieve approved training organisation status by 5 September 1990 or two years after the start of their contract. One of the criteria for this is financial viability. Organisations must demonstrate that they have the financial resources to fulfil their contracted obligations, operate effective financial systems and controls and maintain up-to-date and accurate administrative records.

It is not possible to provide a comprehensive list of private companies involved with the provision of the youth training scheme and employment training in Scotland.

Birds of Prey

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number, species and cause of death of birds of prey discovered in each of the last three years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The information obtained through the wildlife incident investigation scheme of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland on numbers of birds of prey discovered dead is set out in the table. I understand that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds also keeps records, but these cannot be compared directly because they are compiled on a different basis. The RSPB totals for the relevant years were 37, 25 and 38.

Speech Therapists

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on cover for maternity leave taken by speech therapists; and what is the average waiting time for children with speech difficulties in the Greater Glasgow health board area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The information requested is not available.

Hospitals (Self-governing Status)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report those hospitals which have declared an interest in applying for self-governing status.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Expressions of interest have been made public by the hospitals at Forfar, the Royal Scottish National hospital at Larbert and the unit at the Foresterhill site in Aberdeen comprising the royal infirmary, maternity hospital and children's hospital.

Prime Minister's Visit (Security)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total cost to public funds of providing security during the visit to Scotland of the Prime Minister on 8, 9 and 10 March.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The level of security required to protect the Prime Minister, or any other public figure, is an operational matter for the chief constable concerned and it is not the practice to give information of the kind requested.

HEALTH

Residential Homes, Easington

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by name and address the nursing and residential homes in the Easington constituency and the cost per patient per home borne by the Department of Social Security.

Mr. Freeman: Information about nursing homes and residential care homes is not collected centrally in this form. Details of nursing homes and residential care homes registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984 are kept by district health authorities and local social services authorities respectively. Benefit levels and the payments made to individual residents are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Care in the Community

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what extra resources are to be made available to statutory authorities to provide care in the community within the Easington constituency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: New burdens on local authorities as a result of the community care policy will be taken into account when determining their grant entitlement for 1991-92. The extra resources will be distributed to individual authorities through the standard spending assessment for personal social services. The formula is being reconsidered in the light of the new policies and discussions with local authorities. Final decisions on resource issues will be taken in the course of the current public expenditure discussions.

Additional resources for health care from April 1991, including care in the community, will also be considered as part of the current public expenditure survey. It is for the health authorities to decide on levels of expenditure in each part of their programme having regard to local plans and circumstances.

Dental Service

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimated proportion of the costs of the general dental service will come from patients' charges assuming that continuing care payments are in place under the proposed new dental contract.

Mr. Freeman: The 1990-91 estimates laid before Parliament show income from patient charges for general dental services in England as £388 million—38 per cent. of the estimated cost.

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total cost of the general dental service in the United Kingdom in terms of both current and constant prices over the last five financial years; and what are the best estimates for the costs of the service at current prices in 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Freeman: The gross cost of the general dental services in England in cash and at 1989-90 prices over the last five complete financial years is given in the table. The estimated outturn for 1989-90 is £970 million. The estimated gross cost of the general dental service in England in 1990-91, as shown in the main estimates, is £1,019·4 million. Information on the general dental services in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Northern Ireland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

	1984-85 £ million	1985-86 £ million	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million	1988-89 £ million

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the costs of the general dental care service came from patients' charges in the period of the last five years.

Mr. Freeman: The proportion of the gross costs of the general dental services in England recovered from patients' charges in the last five complete financial years is given in the table.

Self-governing Hospitals

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospitals applying for self-governing status within the north-west region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Formal applications for NHS trust status will not be made until Parliament has given approval to the necessary legislation. Only at this stage will units decide whether or not to submit a firm application. However, the following units in the North Western regional health authority have expressed an interest in trust status:

Christie hospital
Central Manchester hospital and community services
Royal Preston hospital
South Manchester health authority community unit
Stepping Hill hospital and Stockport infirmary
Wrightington hospital

Hampshire Constituencies

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list in the Official Report the size of the electorate of each parliamentary constituency in Hampshire and the extent to which each such constituency differs from the electoral quota for England, expressed both in numbers and in percentage.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is given in the table.

Parliamentary constituency	Electors on 1990 register	1989 register
		Electors	Above electoral quota by
			Number	Per cent.
Aldershot	83,356	82,750	13,217	19·0

Southampton, Test	74,703	74,334	4,801	6·9
Winchester	79,226	79,373	9,840	14·2

Note: The 1989 electoral quota for England was 69,533. The 1990 quota cannot be calculated until the electorates for all constituencies in England are available centrally in about two months time.

Infant Mortality (Greenwich)

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what targets Greenwich health authority has set to reduce its infant mortality rate; and what level of resources have been allocated to this task.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held centrally but the hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of Greenwich health authority for the details she seeks.

Health Authority Chairmen

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the chairmen of regional and district health authorities in England and Wales by authority, indicating (i) their age if over 60 years, (ii) their political affiliation if known and (iii) whether or not they are resident in the area covered by the health authority.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health authority chairmen's appointments in England as at 1 April 1990 are listed in the tables which have been placed in the Library. Eight regional chairmen and 88 district chairmen are aged over 60 years. Dates of birth of individual chairmen are held in confidence. We do not seek details of their political affiliations. Chairmen who are resident within the district they serve are marked with an "R" in the tables. Those who do not live within their region or district usually have some other connection with it, for example they work or have a second home there.

Speech Therapists

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by how much the average salary of a speech therapist has increased since 1979 in real and percentage terms and what has been the percentage increases in (a) average doctor's pay, (b) average nurse's pay, (c) the salary of skilled workers and (d) the cost of living.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Between 1979-80 and 1988-89 (1 August—31 July) settlements for doctors and dentists were worth 149·5 per cent., nurses 184·8 per cent., speech therapists 138·7 per cent. and the retail prices index rose by 98·9 per cent. The real-terms increase over this period for speech therapists was 20 per cent. Information is not readily available about overall pay on a comparable basis and there is no precise category of skilled workers.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have started training in speech therapy in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information is not collected centrally on the numbers entering speech therapy training. I understand from information supplied by the College of Speech Therapists that the total number of people starting training in speech therapy at the 16 training establishments in the United Kingdom for the years 1982 to 1988 was as follows:

	Number
1982	380
1983	374
1984	395
1985	376
1986	389
1987	394
1988	409

Figures for earlier years are not available. The provisional figure for 1989 is 450.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many schools for the deaf have a speech therapist provided by the health authority; and how many schools requiring one have not had their needs met by the health authority.

Mr. Freeman: The information is not available centrally. It is for individual health authorities to determine the speech therapy services that can be made available to hearing impaired children, in the light of local circumstances, their assessment of priorities, and the available resources.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists are estimated to have permanently left the profession in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists have been employed in the National Health Service in each of the last 10 years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information is as follows:

NHS qualified speech therapists at 30 September each year—England

1979	1,510
1980	1,650

Note: All figures are independently rounded to the nearest ten (10) whole-time equivalents.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists he estimates are required per 100,000 population; and what is the current national average.

Mr. Freeman: A research study by Dr. Philip Davies of Oxford university, funded by the Department and published in December 1989, estimated that 26·0 (whole-time equivalent) qualified speech therapists per 100,000 population would be required if current methods of intervention were maintained. The research also indicated that the number of qualified therapists required could be reduced to 20·5 (whole-time equivalent) per 100,000 population if assistants were used to assist with group work. Dr. Davies's study concluded that a major review of the current concepts of speech therapy provision appeared to be warranted. In accordance with this the Department is supporting the College of Speech Therapists work to produce national guidelines for speech therapy services and will discuss with the college the introduction of another grade to provide appropriate assistance for the degree qualified members of the profession. The current national average of qualified speech therapists is 5·7 (whole-time equivalent) per 100,000 population.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapists per head of population are employed by each of the regional health authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information is as follows:

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many speech therapy posts in special schools are currently vacant; and what proportion this is of the total number.

Mr. Freeman: The information is not available centrally and could not be provided in the form required. It is for individual authorities to decide on the deployment of speech therapists.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many unfilled speech therapy posts there are in the National Health Service as a whole; and how many in each of the regions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information, which has not yet been fully validated is as follows:

Speech Problems

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will encourage health authorities to ensure that training programmes for those who have contact with the public include a showing of the National Speak Week video, "Show You Care".

Mr. Freeman: Health authorities are responsible for determining their own staff training programmes and are already be well aware of the need to include information about communication difficulties in those programmes. We are taking steps to commend to all health authorities the use of the National Speak Week video "Show You Care".

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those physical and psychological problems that can lead to speech defects according to information known to his Department.

Mr. Freeman: We are aware that speech and language defects can arise from mental handicap, cerebral palsy, cranio-facial abnormalities, hearing impairment, cerebrovascular accident-stroke, head injury, head and neck surgery, progressive neurological diseases, autism, developmental aphasia, senile dementia, other phsychiatric disorders and a variety of rarer conditions.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report the salary scales for speech therapists

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is in "Advance Letter (SP) 4/90" a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will seek evidence on the number and proportion of advertisements for speech therapy posts for which there are no applications.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will seek information on the number of children in special schools who need speech therapy but are not receiving it because a speech therapist cannot be obtained.

Mr. Freeman: Local education authorities and district health authorities are responsible for arranging speech therapy services for children in special schools. We are aware that, despite the increase in the numbers of speech therapists employed in the National Health Service and the initiatives we are taking with the professions, there are shortages in some areas. These are local problems which should be resolved by management locally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what educational literature or publicity on the difficulties faced by those with speech problems has been provided by the Health Education Council; and if he will encourage the council to do more.

Mr. Freeman: There are no current publications dealing with this subject produced by the Health Education Authority. Whilst many preventable conditions—such as low birthweight and stroke—can lead to speech problems, it is the primary causes of these conditions which the Health Education Authority generally addresses. Many publications dealing with the remedial aspects of such conditions are produced, more appropriately, by voluntary and other bodies who have developed a special understanding of the difficulties faced by particular groups. These publications are made use of by health authorities and professionals.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what evidence he has on the trend in the overall number of people with speech defects; and what is the trend in each of the major categories of people with speech defects;

(2) what is the estimated number of people who suffer speech defects; and if he will classify them according to the major causes of the defect.

Mr. Freeman: An article, "Communication Disorders, Planning a Service to meet the Needs" published in the December 1989 issue of the "British Journal of Disorders of Communication" by Dr. Enderby and Dr. Davies, and based on research funded by the Department, confirmed an earlier estimate of approximately 2·3 million people in the United Kingdom with speech and language disorders, produced by Dr. Enderby and Dr. Philipp. The article, a copy of which is in the Library, also contained estimates for most of the major categories of speech and language disorder. There is no firm evidence available about trends in overall numbers and individual categories.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost of restoring some mobility by a hip operation to an arthritic patient; and what is the average cost of restoring some speech through speech therapy to a patient who has suffered a stroke.

Mr. Freeman: Information is not available in the form requested. The average cost of a National Health Service hip replacement operation was approximately £2,600 in 1988-89.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of speech therapists currently have specialist qualifications.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health with whom he has discussed the problem of matching the supply and demand for speech therapy; what information he has collected; and when he intends to publish his conclusions.

Mr. Freeman: Officials have held discussions about speech therapy supply and demand issues with representatives of the College of Speech Therapists, the Association of Speech Therapy Managers, National Health Service officials, individual speech therapists and other organisations and individuals. A variety of information has been collected and conclusions will be published as and when appropriate.

Indicative Drugs Budgets

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will announce the procedure for the consultation with general practitioners and others by FHSAs prior to the setting of indicative drugs budgets.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Practices will be able to discuss their indicative prescribing budgets with their family practitioner committees before they are set. Family practitioner committees will consider the practices' historic spending patterns, comparable average costs for that family practitioner committee, special circumstances of the practices including high-cost patients, anticipated changes in demand and an allowance for the forecast increase in the cost of drugs. In this way, the needs of the practices and their patients will be fully taken into account in setting the budgets.

Residential Homes

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to make arrangements for those employed by regional or district health authorities, or National Health Service hospital trusts, directly or indirectly, who have direct or indirect financial interests in residential homes or nursing homes, to be required to register such interests.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We expect health authorities to ensure that their employees declare any interests which may influence the way in which the authority discharges its responsibilities. It is for individual authorities to decide how this is best achieved. The same principle will apply to NHS trusts.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reports he has received from health authorities about staff who advise patients on the availability of private residential care receiving commissions from private residential homes for referring clients; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no record of any such reports.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to arrange for those private residential premises, who care for individuals in receipt of Department of Health and Department of Social Security support, to register for easy public inspection the names of those holding direct or indirect pecuniary interest in the home.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Part 1 of the Registered Homes Act 1984 provides for local authorities to make available for inspection at all reasonable times, registers of those persons responsible for carrying on a residential care home registered under the 1984 Act.

Meningitis and Hepatitis A (School Outbreaks)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the outbreak (a) of meningitis in a school in Runcorn, Merseyside and (b) of hepatitis A in a school at Croxteth, Merseyside.

Mr. Freeman: Two children from the Brookvale primary school were admitted to Warrington general hospital for treatment for meningitis and one child for observation. All have now been discharged. The health authorities concerned have done everything necessary to keep the outbreak under control.

Five children from St. Swithin's school in Croxteth have contracted hepatitis A. We are satisfied that the Liverpool public health department is taking the necessary measures to control the outbreak.

Labour Statistics

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the mid-year estimate of the population of working age between the ages of 16 and 59 or 64 years in Great Britain and for each of the standard regions in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows:

Population of working age (16 to 64 for males: 16 to 59 for females)

Region	Mid-year 1979	[1]Mid-year 1988
North	1,877·9	1,890·9
Yorkshire and Humberside	2,911·5	3,016·7
East Midlands	2,279·4	2,463·6
East Anglia	1,097·0	1,231·6
South East	10,222·6	10,783·7
South West	2,504·6	2,781·0
West Midlands	3,117·5	3,230·5
North West	3,828·4	3,897·0
Wales	1,653·0	1,724·7
Scotland	3,084·9	3,169·8
Great Britain	32,576·8	34,189·5

[1] Populations estimates for mid-1989 have not yet been made and are not expected to be available until July 1990.

THE ARTS

East Midlands

68. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met representatives of the arts in the east midlands; what was discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I met the chairman and director of East Midlands Arts on 19 December to discuss the Wilding report.

Royal Shakespeare Company

69. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has on contributions made by the City of London Corporation to the Royal Shakespeare Company since the Barbican centre was built.

Mr. Luce: The City of London Corporation provided the Barbican theatre as a purpose-built London home for the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1982. Since then the RSC has enjoyed a rent which is low by commercial standards. In 1988 the corporation also agreed to contribute £500,000 towards the RSC's accumulated deficit.

Arts Council

70. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last met the chairman of the Arts Council; and what was discussed.

Mr. Luce: I meet Mr. Palumbo from time to time to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Wilding Report

71. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received concerning the Crafts Council following his statement on the Wilding report.

Mr. Luce: I have received general support for my announcement to the House on 13 March 1990 that the Crafts Council will remain an independent body.

Queen Street Mill, Burnley

72. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make a visit to Queen Street mill, Marle Syke, Burnley.

Mr. Luce: I have no plans at present to visit the Queen Street mill museum, Burnley.

Admission Charges

73. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he has any plans to enforce charges for art galleries.

Mr. Luce: The Government's repeatedly stated policy is that the decision whether to operate a system of admission charges or voluntary donations should be for the board of trustees responsible for each institution.

The Government neither impose nor prohibit the imposition of admission charges.

I confirm this in the Government's response to the recent report of the Education, Science and Arts Committee, copies of which I placed in the Library of the House on 12 March.

Donations

74. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will list the five highest individual corporate or private donors to the arts in the last 12 months.

Mr. Luce: Such information is not held centrally. However, with business sponsorship of the arts now estimated at well over £30 million a year, donors, both great and small, are making a very useful contribution to supporting the arts.

Royal National Theatre (Exhibition)

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the Royal National theatre to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Luce: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 14 to 18 May.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Service Unions

80. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met representatives of the Civil Service unions; and what subjects were discussed.

81. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met Civil Service unions; and what matters were discussed.

84. Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met representatives of the Civil Service unions; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Luce: I meet the Civil Service unions from time to time, to discuss a range of matters.

Next Steps Agencies

82. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what progress has been made in developing the next steps agencies; and what was discussed.

85. Mr. Watts: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what progress has been made in the setting up of Civil Service agencies since his last statement to the House.

Mr. Luce: Excellent progress is being made. Only last week, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry launched the insolvency service as an executive agency, bringing the total number of agencies to 12, with many more to follow. I hope to make a further statement shortly.

Equal Opportunities

83. Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what further progress has been made to implement the Civil Service's equal opportunities employment programme.

Mr. Luce: Good progress is being made. We will shortly be publishing a revised code of practice on the employment of people with disabilities. The programme of action on women continues to be implemented, and in May, I shall introduce a new programme for action to achieve equality of opportunity in the Civil Service for people of ethnic minority origin.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Lindane

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on when the Advisory Committee on Pesticides will be discussing the matter of lindane.

Mr. Gummer: Scientists within the Health and Safety Executive and MAFF are currently evaluating the data on lindane. It is not yet possible to predict when their report will be put to the Advisory Committee on Pesticides but it is being treated as a priority.

Pesticides

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek to obtain the handbook of basic information on the 100 most commonly used pesticides in the United States of America, published by the United States Department of Agriculture; and if he will arrange for a similar publication in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: This Department and the Department of Agriculture for Scotland monitor usage of pesticides and the results are published. We are currently preparing a review of the surveys carried out between 1984 and 1989, which cover all main crops, to be published later this year. The USDA publication is being sought.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the pesticides for which his Ministry carries out surveillance for residues in food that are (a) banned in the United Kingdom and (b) in use in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Monitoring for pesticide residues is carried out by the working party on pesticide residues. Results are published and show, for all samples analysed, both those pesticides which have been sought and the levels of any residues which have been found.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he intends to take to phase out pesticides listed in part (c) of annex B of the final declaration of the third international conference on the protection of the North sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Under the terms of the North sea declaration, special attention is to be paid to phasing out pesticides which are the most persistent, toxic and liable to bioaccumulate. Annex 1B, part (c), lists 18 substances the use of which must be strictly limited or banned. Eleven of these substances are not approved for use in the United Kingdom, and approval for another, chlordane, will be withdrawn on 31 December 1992.

The remaining six substances are all tightly controlled under the Control of Pesticide Regulations 1986. Atrazine is being reviewed by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides, mercury compounds and PCP are being considered by the European Community, and chloropicrin, fluroacetamide and quintozene will be considered by the Advisory Committee on Pesticides when priorities for review are set later this year.

Baby Milk Products

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to introduce legislation limiting the aluminium content of baby milk products produced by manufacturers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans to introduce legislation. Results of the Government's surveillance work show that likely intakes of aluminium from baby milk products are well below the provisionally tolerable weekly intake set by the joint FAO/WHO expert committee on food additives.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking to ensure that the aluminium content in baby milk products does not exceed the European Commission's recommended safety limits.

Mr. Maclean: There are no recommended EC limits for aluminium in baby foods.

Radioactivity

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the research projects he is currently (a) conducting or (b) funding on the effects of radioactivity contamination on agriculture and food products, giving the research establishment in each case.

Mr. Gummer: The following projects are being funded by my Department in 1989-90.

Project title	Contractor
Wind tunnel and rain tower studies	IC
Implementation of models for upland environments	ANS
Maintenance and support of the Soil-Plant-Animal Dynamic-Evaluation (SPADE) suite of codes	ANS
Field investigations on the dynamics of Caesium in agricultural foodchains following the Chernobyl accident: Sample collection and analysis	ANS
Further experimental studies on radionuclide transfer to upland plant species	ANS
Enhancement of atmospheric dispersion models in the SPADE suite of codes	ANS
Development of a method to rapidly predict the availability of radio-caesium to animal products after an accidental discharge	ITE/MLURI
Vegetation/soil survey in Cumbrian restricted area-validation of aerial survey	ITE
Studies on Caesium in soil, plants and sheep in Ireland	QUB
Particle properties and root uptake	UKAEA
Continuation of studies into the use of Prussian Blue to reduce body burdens of caesium in sheep	QUB
Comparative deposition and uptake by crops of radionuclides around English and French nuclear sites	UKAEA
Influence of upland soil type on caesium uptake	UKAEA
Assessment of novel analytical techniques	UKAEA
Strontium-90 in crops and effect of Chernobyl deposition	UKAEA
Development of automation of Strontium-90 analytical method	UKAEA
Gut uptake of fission products from fuel particles	UKAEA
Implementation of risk assessment and emergency codes for personal computers	CERC
Effects of land management on caesium recycling	ANS
Radionuclide transfer: a critical view	ANS
Methods to reduce agricultural impact	ANS
Radionuclide uptake by sheep	ITE
Transfer of radionuclides in an area reclaimed from the sea	NRPB
Specification of models for upland environments	ANS
Further evaluation of data obtained from field investigations on caesium dynamics following Chernobyl. Analysis of 1988-89 samples	ANS
Effects of organic matter on caesium uptake in pasture	UKAEA
Studies into the migration and binding of radio-caesium in peat	UKAEA
The migration of caesium 134 and 137 in peat	UKAEA
Recycling of radio-caesium	UKAEA
Preparation of detailed maps on selected farms in north Wales known to have received Chernobyl fall-out	SSLRC

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number and types of equipment he has for measuring radioactivity in plants, animals and liquids.

Mr. Gummer: My Department maintains fully equipped laboratory facilities, provided with a comprehensive range of radiometric equipment for measuring all types of radioactivity in any kind of agricultural, fisheries or food materials. In addition, we have 50 sodium iodide detectors which may be used, among other things, for monitoring gamma-emitting radionuclides in live animals in field conditions.

Food Stockpiles

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the quantities and types of food which are stockpiled as part of his emergency planning procedures.

Mr. Gummer: The strategic food stockpile contains flour, sugar, refined fat, yeast, special formulation biscuits, sweets and vitaminised skimmed milk powder, chosen for their value as sources of energy and nutrition for use in time of war or severe national crisis. It has been the policy of successive Governments not to reveal detailed information on the level and locations of the stockpile.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the aims of the Institute of Grocery Distribution study on identifying major food stocks for defence planning.

Mr. Gummer: The aim of this study is to provide my Department with up-to-date information on food stocks and patterns of food distribution for contingency planning purposes.

Intervention Board

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made towards establishing the Intervention Board as an executive agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I am pleased to announce that the Intervention Board will become an executive agency with effect from 1 April 1990.

The Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce was set up by the European Communities Act 1972. It is appointed by Agricultural Ministers to carry out this country's obligations under the common agricultural policy of the European Community. The board delegates its functions to the Government Department created by section 6 of the 1972 Act, and this is the new agency.

The agency's task is to administer the market regulation and production support measures of the guarantee section of the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund. Its aim will be to operate them as economically, efficiently and effectively as possible. The board will oversee the way in which the agency exercises its responsibilities.

As a Government Department the Intervention Board has achieved a great deal since it was created in 1972. Establishing it as an agency will give it the impetus and additional financial and management tools to build on the good work achieved; to strengthen its performance; and to promote a more effective and efficient quality of service to its customers. The agency's efficiency will mainly be judged through indexes of unit cost and productivity. Additional performance measures relating to its objectives will be developed through its corporate and business plans. The financial targets for 1990-91 will be:

(i.) to achieve annual cumulative efficiency gains on its running costs of 2 per cent.

(ii.) to keep disallowance resulting from the agency's actions and falling on the Exchequer following the clearance of the 1988 EAGGF accounts to 0·5 per cent. of the vote 1 turnover; and

(iii.) to keep non-financing losses on intervention stocks to 6·5 per cent of total intervention activity.

Mr. Guy Stapleton who has been the chief executive of the Intervention board as a Government Department since 1986, has been appointed chief executive of the agency. We wish him and his staff every success in their new role.

Copies of the framework document are being placed in the Library of the House.

Lead-contaminated Food

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the action taken by his Department to protect consumers following the recent importation of lead-contaminated animal feedingstuffs.

Mr. Gummer: As soon as there was clear evidence of a possible threat to the safety of food supplies, the Government imposed strict statutory controls to protect consumers under part I of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.

Two thousand and eight-five tonnes of lead contaminated maize gluten replacer pellets were imported of which 730 tonnes were distributed and incorporated into 7,400 tonnes of commercial animal feed rations. My Department had the task of tracing all this imported material through the complex chain of importers, compounders, merchants and agents, of informing all recipients, implementing the necessary controls and supervising the withdrawal and disposal of contaminated feed. In all, some 2,100 farms in England and Wales were found to have received varying amounts of lead-contaminated feedingstuffs, including 1,062 dairy farms.

All milk produced on these farms was collected separately and used to manufacture powdered milk and butter which were stored pending full scientific analysis. In addition, an intensive sampling programme for ex-farm liquid milk was organised, in conjunction with the Milk Marketing Board, to enable restrictions to be lifted from individual farms as soon as lead levels were confirmed to have fallen below the limit set by Department of Health. A total of nearly 14,000 individual milk samples were taken and, by 13 December, milk restrictions were lifted from all farms.

Three livestock release schemes were introduced, two of which required the taking and analysing of blood samples from the animals concerned. During the 11 weeks for which these schemes were in operation, 20 complete farms were released from all restrictions under scheme I, 116,000 animals were released under scheme II and 7,000 animals under scheme III. We analysed 22,000 blood samples.

A number of scientific research and monitoring programmes were set up at short notice to elucidate the behaviour of lead in livestock and foods of various types and to monitor the decline in lead levels once all the contaminated feed had been removed. In the light of the information obtained, all the remaining livestock movement and slaughter restrictions were lifted on 12 February.

As a result of the firm action taken by the Government, together with the painstaking work undertaken by officials in the various Government Departments and outside organisations involved, and with the constructive co-operation of the vast majority of farmers and traders, I believe that the Government have been able to ensure the full protection of consumers, and to preserve justifiable confidence in British agricultural produce, both at home and overseas.

Salmonella

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress on control of salmonella in the European Community.

Mr. Gummer: The European Commissioner for Agriculture has assured me that he will present proposals on the control of zoonoses by May with a view to adoption by the Council in the summer. I welcome this undertaking as I believe that controls on salmonella should be adopted on a Community basis.

We have a strong basis upon which to pursue discussions in the Community because of the stringent and comprehensive set of measures in the United Kingdom to combat the salmonella problem. Our measures extend throughout the production chain, covering feedingstuffs, controls on breeding flocks, hatcheries and laying flocks and hygienic practices during slaughter and processing. These have been directed in particular at egg production, but have also helped to control salmonella in the poultry meat sector. The action that we have taken in the United Kingdom has clearly had an impact in reducing potential causes of human food poisoning, particularly from eggs.

As for the Community policy, we believe that the key priority areas will be to ensure clean hatchery and breeding stock for both layers and broiler flocks and to minimise any risk of infection entering through feed. Good hygiene is essential through all stages of production as this reduces overall infection. We believe that the Community measures will also need to require regular testing of laying flocks and to specify appropriate action when salmonellae, of types particularly associated with human food poisoning, are found.

The Community measures will need to take account of all relevant research and to ensure that the action taken in respect of particular poultry flocks is commensurate with the health risks which may be present. Consideration should be given, for example, to including in Community policy the option of treating certain types of flock to remove or prevent infection in young birds before they come into lay. The Government are already reviewing this possibility. In addition, there is a need to consider whether inhibitory treatment of chicks is an option that should be encouraged in commercial laying flocks to prevent them becoming infected.

The risk of infection in eggs arises from certain invasive forms of salmonellae which can infect the egg before it is laid. When these are present in laying or breeding flock our policy has been to prevent any eggs from the flock entering the food chain and we will be looking for similar steps to be taken throughout the Community.

It is important to remove any risk to public health when infected flocks are compulsorily slaughtered. We have hitherto ensured this by requiring the carcases to be destroyed. However, in discussions in the Community it has become clear that regulations are likely to follow the approach of applying safeguards to the end products permitting them to be consumed without danger to health rather than requiring carcases from infected flocks to be destroyed. We recognise that an alternative to our present policy would be to ensure that any salmonellae present in the bird are destroyed by thorough cooking. This is the normal treatment process for birds at the end of their laying cycle. In the light of these considerations, the Government have decided to permit carcases from infected flocks to be processed under carefully controlled conditions and subject to stringent safeguards to remove any risk from the product to public health and we will be seeking to ensure similar requirements in the Community discussions.

The flock owner will retain the proceeds from the sale of the birds and our compensation arrangements will be adjusted accordingly.

We will be issuing on 2 April further advice to local authorities, which enforce the poultry meat hygiene legislation, on measures to minimise the spread of salmonellae in poultry slaughterhouses. This, like the action taken over breeding flocks and hatcheries, will minimise the level of infection in birds reared for the table. It will, of course, continue to be necessary for caterers and retailers to ensure that raw and partly cooked poultry products are carefully handled and for any raw meat to be handled properly in the home and fully cooked, as emphasised in the Government's food safety leaflet.

I believe that measures adopted on a Community basis will give the best protection to consumers and I will be working to achieve a speedy and effective agreement so that consumers can have confidence in food supplies whether they are home-produced or imported from other member states.

Sheep Scab

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of outbreaks of sheep scab in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Gummer: The information is as follows:

Sheep scab outbreaks

Year	England	Wales	Scotland	Total
1980	33	—	—	33
1981	45	11	10	66
1982	87	5	2	94
1983	144	10	3	157
1984	116	9	6	131
1985	23	41	10	74
1986	19	36	—	55
1987	23	14	1	38
1988	26	9	1	36
1989	60	5	1	66
1990[1]	15	5	—	20

[1] January and February.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has plans to suspend the compulsory dipping of sheep not affected with sheep scab; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: As announced by the then Parliamentary Secretary on 14 April 1989, there will be national compulsory dips for sheep scab in the autumn of both 1989 and 1990.

Nuclear Accidents

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to conduct an aerial survey of the whole or part of the United Kingdom in the event of an accident occurring in a nuclear power station in northern France; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The safety of foodstuffs, for which my Department is responsible, requires direct measurement of dietary items. The potential value of an aerial survey in relation to food production would need to be assessed in the light of specific circumstances.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has conducted a review of his emergency planning procedures as a result of a nuclear accident in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 18 December 1986.

My Department played a full part in the Government's post-Chernobyl review of contingency planning, including preparation of the national response plan for dealing with the effects of a future nuclear accident overseas. We shall continue to review and update our emergency arrangements in the light of technical and scientific developments both at home and overseas. Details of our arrangements for each of the major United Kingdom nuclear sites are being prepared for publication and copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

Drainage Rates

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he intends to introduce new regulations to amend the provisions of the Land Drainage Act 1976 in order to permit the National Rivers Authority and internal drainage boards to precept drainage rates from (i) domestic householders, (ii) business premises and (iii) agricultural holdings.

Mr. Curry: We have already made the Internal Drainage Boards (Finance) Regulations 1990 (SI 1990 No. 72) which came into force on 24 January 1990. They provide that, from 1 April 1990, internal drainage boards (and the NRA when acting as an internal drainage board), may continue to collect drainage rates direct from the agricultural sector and, in respect of the non-agricultural sector may impose a special levy on the district councils in whose area the internal drainage district lies.

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will state what consultations he has held with interested parties over the method by which drainage rates will be levied after 1 April.

Mr. Curry: We consulted the Association of County Councils, Association of District Councils, Association of Drainage Authorities, Association of London Authorities, Confederation of British Industry, Country Landowners Association, Internal Drainage Boards, London Boroughs Association, National Association of Local Councils, National Farmers Union, National Rivers Authority and the Tenant Farmers Association.

Veterinary Laboratories, Bangor

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to close the veterinary laboratories in Bangor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The review of the veterinary investigation service commissioned by the Minister, has now been finalised and is being submitted to Ministers for consideration.

As yet, no decisions have been made on any recommendations that might arise from this review.

Water Pollution

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to publish his next report on water pollution from farm waste.

Mr. Gummer: It is intended to publish the joint MAFF/NRA report " Water Pollution From Farm Waste 1989" on 4 April.

Genetically Engineered Organisms

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the labelling requirements in respect of foods containing genetically engineered organisms.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 23 March 1990]: Although there are no specific labelling requirements for foods containing such organisms; the Food Labelling Regulations 1984 apply to most foods, including foods containing genetically engineered organisms. The Food Advisory Committee has been asked to consider, within the context of the Food Labelling Regulations, the need for special labelling of those products containing genetically engineered organisms following their approval by the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes. In the recent case of genetically engineered bakers' yeast the Food Advisory Committee recommended that additional labelling information was not required.

EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what plans he has to review enterprise allowance scheme allocations to Cumbria for the coming financial year;

(2) whether his proposed allocations for the TEC in Cumbria provides support resources for enterprise allowance scheme awards in the financial year 1990-91.

Mr. Eggar: The size and scale of the enterprise allowance scheme is regularly reviewed to take account of levels of unemployment and the demand for places. Allocations to TECs in respect of the scheme will be determined by the Training Agency's regional directors. I am confident that the allocation to the Cumbria TEC will provide adequate support resources for that area.

YTS

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the numbers of accidents on YTS, fatal, major and minor, for the period September to December 1989; and how many YTS placements were closed or not accepted in the period.

Mr. Nicholls: YTS accident statistics and closure and non-acceptance figures on health and safety grounds are collected on a quarterly basis. Table A provides YTS accident figures for the period 1 October 1989 to 31 December 1989.

Table A

	Accidents[1]
Fatalities	Major injuries[2]	Minor injuries
1[3]	170	721

Table B provides the closure and non-acceptance figures for the period 1 October 1989 to 31 December 1989. These figures are provisional.

Table B

	Number
Placements closed	6
Placements not accepted	1

[1] Training Agency figures have been compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the Training Agency's figures will include a number of accidents to trainees in educational establishments and road traffic accidents which may not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

[2] Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985.

[3] This fatality was a road traffic accident in scheme time.

Wages Inspectors

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on plans for restructuring the wages inspectorate in Wales.

Mr. Nicholls: There are no plans to restructure the wages inspectorate in Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the number of establishments visited in Wales by wages inspectors in each year since 1979.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is given in the following table.

	Number visited
1979	2,097
1980	2,131
1981	1,753
1982	1,720
1983	1,508
1984	1,249
1985	1,577
1986	1,318
1987	1,039
1988	1,014
1989	970

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the number of wages inspectorate officers with responsibility for Wales at (a) senior executive officer grade, (b) higher executive officer grade and (c) clerical grades.

Mr. Nicholls: Wages inspection in Wales is the responsibility of the wages inspectorate divisional offices in Manchester and Bristol and is not administered separately from the other areas covered by those offices.

The total number of staff in those offices at the grades specified is given in the table.

	Staff

Health and Safety Commission

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date the annual report of the Health and Safety Commission was launched; how many copies of the report have been published; and on what date he expects copies of the report to be made available to the general public.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Commission's annual report for 1988-89 was launched on Monday 26 February 1990. A total of 2,500 copies of the published report have been sent to HMSO for sale to the public. These will be available in London from 23 March and elsewhere by 29 March.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for how long Training Agency staff will be contracted to the training and enterprise councils.

Mr. Eggar: Training Agency staff who have volunteered to second to training and enterprise councils will normally go on secondment for an initial period of three years. This period may subsequently be extended by mutual agreement between the Training Agency, the secondee and the training and enterprise council.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how long training and enterprise council contracts will run.

Mr. Eggar: Training and enterprise council contracts will not have a fixed duration but will be subject to the production each year of an agreed business plan.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if any additional expenditure is being given to training and enterprise councils to undertake new training programmes other than employment training and youth training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Training and enterprise councils (TECs) will be responsible for running the training programmes and business support activities currently managed by my Department. They will be given appropriate budgets to enable them to do this. Additionally, TECs will have a local initiative fund which can be used to finance new initiatives or to strengthen and expand existing programmes and services.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if any contracts have been concluded with any of the training and enterprise councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I expect to conclude contracts with the first training and enterprise councils in early April.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if discussions have taken place with the training and enterprise councils regarding the reduction in expenditure on youth training per trainee week between 1989-90 and 1992-93; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The budget available for youth training has been discussed with training and enterprise councils (TECs) as part of the discussions over their business plans. A number of TECs have now submitted their plans setting out how they intend to improve the skills and qualifications of young people in their area.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has received representations from the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses regarding the composition of training and enterprise councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses Ltd has raised a number of issues with me including the composition of the boards of training and enterprise councils. The federation was advised that TEC boards and their members must meet the criteria set out in "Training and Enterprise Councils: a Prospectus for the 1990s", published in March 1989.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the estimated training and enterprise councils' expenditure in England and Wales in 1990-91 for the provision of ET and YTS.

Mr. Eggar: The 1990-91 supply estimate (class VI vote 1, Department of Employment: training and enterprise programmes) shows the planned expenditure for ET and YT. Table 2 on page 13 shows the estimated expenditure for these and the Training Agency's other main programmes by TECs and area offices.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the applications received for setting up training and enterprise councils; if he will list those given development funding including the expenditure involved; if he will list those under consideration; and if he will list the areas of England and Wales where applications are still awaited.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the training and enterprise councils in receipt of development funding by (a) those which have submitted operational budgets, including the amount of expenditure involved, (b) those which have contracts approved including the amount of expenditure and (c) those which have yet to submit operational budgets.

Mr. Eggar: Thirteen training and enterprise councils (TECs) have submitted their corporate and business plans. These are:

Calderdale and Kirklees
Cumbria
Devon and Cornwall
Dorset
East Lancashire
Hertfordshire
Oldham
Rochdale
South and East Cheshire
Teesside
Thames Valley
Tyneside
Wearside

The budgets for these TECs are still under discussion. Contracts will be signed when the plans are approved.

The following TECs are currently in the development phase and have yet to submit their corporate and business plans:

Avon
AZTEC
Barnsley-Doncaster
Bedfordshire
Birmingham
Bolton-Bury
Bradford and District
Central and South Cambridgeshire
CENTEC
CEWTEC

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline the guidance given to each training and enterprise council regarding the preparation of a profile of the needs of the unemployed, an assessment of employer-based skill shortages and an analysis of training and education provision in their area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The "Guide to Planning" requires training and enterprise councils (TECs) to undertake a thorough market assessment of their area. The outcome of this assessment will form the basis of the proposals contained in a TEC's corporation plan an business plan.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline the guideline given to training and enterprise councils covering the consultations required with (a) local government and (b) education authorities, (c) chambers of commerce, (d) the Engineering Employers Federation and (e) trade councils.

Mr. Eggar: The "Guide to Planning" emphasises the need for training and enterprise councils (TECs) to actively consult and involve all organisations in their area with an interest in education and training and small business support.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place a copy of the TEC operations guideline in the Library.

Mr. Eggar: I will place a copy of the TEC operating manual in the Library when it is available.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if the operational budgets included in the TEC contracts contain premiums for an increased employer contribution to youth training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: It is in employers' interests that they should increasingly contribute towards the costs of youth training to ensure its relevance to the needs of industry and commerce. The funding levels which TECs will receive for youth training in 1990-91 therefore assume a rise in the level of employer contributions.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the date for the launch of the first training and enterprise council.

Mr. Eggar: I expect contracts to be signed with the first training and enterprise councils (TECs) in early April.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the employment training and youth training expenditure is to be used for performance and incentive bonus payments paid to TECs.

Mr. Eggar: A system of performance-related funding is being established to give an incentive for good and progressively better performance by TECs in achieving objectives. A bonus fund equal to 2 per cent. of overall programme funds will be allocated to TECs achieving specified levels of performance in particular areas of activity.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what provision for employers' contributions to ET are in the operational budgets, included in the TEC contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: It is in employers' interests that they should increasingly contribute towards the cost of employment training, as many employers already do. Employment training funding levels for TECs assume continuing employer contributions.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations have been received from training and enterprise council board members about the level of expenditure being approved for programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have received a number of representations from training and enterprise council board members on funding issues. TECs will receive agreed resources to implement their plans and my officials are currently negotiating with individual TECs about the resources that will be made available.

Labour Statistics

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give the total number of employees in (a) manufacturing, (b) services and (c) all industries and services in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (i) June 1979 and (ii) June 1989; and what was the figure between the two years in (1) numbers and (2) percentage;

(2) what was the number of employees in employment in Great Britain in each of the standard regions in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989; and what is the difference between the two years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage;

(3) what was the number of people in employment excluding Her Majesty's forces in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (a) June 1989 and (b) June 1979; and what was the change in (i) numbers and (ii) as a percentage;

(4) what was the total number of (a) male and (b) female employees in employment, self-employment, Her Majesty's forces and work-related Government training in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (i) June 1979 and (ii) June 1989; (or work related training June 1983); and what are the differences between the two years in (1) numbers and (2) percentage;

(5) what was the total number of part-time and full-time employees in employment and self-employment in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989; and what was the difference between the two years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage;

(6) what was the total number of people in work-related Government training in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (a) June 1983 and (b) June 1989; and what were the differences between the two years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage;

(7) what was the total number of self-employed in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989; and what was the difference between the two years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage;

(8) what was the total work force in employment in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989; and what is the change between the two years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage;

(9) what is his estimate of the numbers of self-employed in (a) manufacturing industries, (b) services and (c) all industries and services for Great Britain and each standard region in (i) June 1979 and (ii) June 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Member has asked a number of related questions. As the answers involve a considerable number of statistical tables, I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the total number of YTS trainees or youth equivalent included in the employees in employment in Great Britain and for each standard region in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989; and what is the change between the years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage.

Mr. Nicholls: The employees in employment figures include only those trainees who have contracts of employment. The table gives the number of such trainees on YTS in each region in June 1989. None of the trainees on the youth opportunities programme in 1979 had contracts of employment, and therefore comparisons between 1979 and 1989 either in real terms or percentage terms is not possible.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of those with a second job as an employee in Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989; and what is the difference between the two years in (i) numbers and (ii) percentage.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates of persons with a second job are available only from labour force surveys, conducted in the spring of each year.

Estimates from the 1979 and 1989 labour force surveys, as requested, are shown in the table:

All persons in employment[1] with a second job as employee, by region spring estimates, thousands and per cent.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total numbers of jobs which would be discounted if all full-time equivalence factors used by the European Community were applied to part-time jobs in (a) June 1979 and (b) June 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: We do not believe in discounting part-time jobs. Furthermore, the apparent method of calculating full-time equivalents set out in the European Commission report "Employment in Europe" is an inappropriate measure of labour input.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the unemployment rate by highest qualification and sex for Great Britain and each standard region for (a) spring 1979 and (b) spring 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: Final estimates from the 1979 labour force survey and preliminary estimates from the 1989 labour force survey are shown in the following table.

[1] Less than 10,000 in cell: estimates not shown.

[2] Based on the Great Britain labour force definition of unemployment (which broadly uses a one-week job search period). The unemployment rate for each qualification level/sex/region category is calculated as the numbers unemployed in the category as a proportion of all economically active persons in the category.

[3] The upper age limit is 64 for males and 59 for females.

[4] Preliminary estimates (1989 only).

[5] A finer breakdown of qualification levels is not given, as many more of the table entries would then be based on small samples and would not be shown.

[6] Includes persons not stating their highest qualification held, and for 1979 only, all persons in full time education and all males aged 60 to 64 (who were not asked about their highest qualification levels).

Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the estimated amount of expenditure on ET and YTS in each of the years 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Nicholls: The expenditure on YTS and employment training by the employment department group Training Agency (and its predecessor the Training Commission) is as follows:

	YTS (£m)	ET (£m)
1988-89 (actual)	993·8	425·0
1989-90 (forecast)	983·0	1,112·0

The YTS figures exclude community industry (included under the heading "Youth Training" in the public expenditure White Paper, evaluation, research and development, and marketing).

Employment training figures exclude the employment rehabilitation service (included under the heading "Training for Unemployed Adults" in the public expenditure White Paper).

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the "Community Action Programme for the Development of Continuing Vocational Training", Com (89) 567 final, of 8 December 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: This European Commission proposal aims to support and complement activities developed by and in member states in the area of continuing vocational training. An explanatory memorandum was submitted to the Commons Select Committee on European Legislation on 31 January 1990. The text is currently being negotiated at official level and the proposal is expected to be considered by the European Community Labour and Social Affairs Council on 29 May 1990.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, further to his answer to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) of 15 March, Official Report, column 340, if he will give the regional breakdown of the number of young people over 18 years on YTS with special training needs endorsements; and if he will make a further statement.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) of 15 March, Official Report, column 340, on young people undertaking the youth training scheme with special training needs endorsement, if he will break down the figures given by region.

Mr. Nicholls: The following table gives the number of young people in training on YTS at 31 December 1989 who were aged 18 and over and had special training needs endorsements.

Region	Number
Scotland	1,600
Northern	1,800
North West	2,900

Wales	1,200
South West	800
South East	1,300
London	1,500
Total	15,900

(All figures rounded to the nearest hundred).

Action for Jobs Campaign

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much of the total expenditure on the Action for Jobs campaign in 1987-88 was spent on regional campaigns.

Mr. Eggar: Expenditure on Action for Jobs regional campaigns in 1987-88 was £1·4 million.

YTS Allowance

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to introduce an increase in the YTS allowance, age-related for 18-year-olds and over, in line with the principles set in April 1988 for income support claimants when rate liability was introduced.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 15 March 1990, Official Report, column 340.

Population Statistics

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of people by highest qualification held, and by sex, for Great Britain and each of the standard regions in (a) spring 1979 and (b) spring 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: Final estimates from the 1979 labour force survey and preliminary estimates from the 1989 labour force survey are shown in the table.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what representations he has received from the mobility allowance campaign concerning the criteria for extending the mobility allowance to deaf-blind people;

(2) what representations he has received from the mobility allowance campaign concerning the eligibility criteria for deaf-blind people for mobility allowance;

(3) when his Department last met the mobility allowance campaign; and when it next intends to do so.

Mr. Scott: The campaign has made representations on several occasions, and letters have been sent in recent weeks to the Department and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Officials will be meeting representatives of the campaign and other organisations on 26 March, and I shall be writing to the campaign following those discussions.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) whether in drawing up the eligibility criteria for extension of mobility allowance to deaf-blind people, he has consulted the mobility allowance campaign;

(2) which organisations his Department has consulted when formulating the eligibility criteria for deaf-blind people to mobility allowance.

Mr. Scott: We were aware of the views of the campaign about the eligibility criteria for the extension of mobility allowance to deaf-blind people.

Community Charge

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will introduce measures to raise the level of support available to people on income support in respect of community charge liabilities;

(2) if he will make special one off payments to those people on income support living in areas where the community charge will be over £315.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will increase income support payments to claimants to cover 20 per cent. of the actual national average of the community charge of £350 as against the notional national average of 20 per cent. of £278.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Income support levels were adjusted on a once-for-all basis in April 1989 to include help towards the average 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge. The amounts included now form part of the overall benefit levels, which are of course being uprated next month.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimates his Department has regarding the number of people on income support who will be worse off under the community charge because the local charge is higher than the figure allowed for in the 20 per cent. uprating.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is not available.

Income Support

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of people receiving income support at the present time.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: A total of 4·3 million claimants were receiving income support in August 1989, the latest date for which information is available.

Maintenance Payments

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he has taken to improve the payment of maintenance by absent parents; and what further action he proposes.

Mr. Newton: From October 1989, we extended the absent parent's liability to maintain to cover dependent children aged 16, 17 and 18. I have also already announced that from next month we are strengthening the basis on which DSS local offices assess absent parents' ability to pay maintenance.

I now propose some further changes in the law, to improve the way in which the present system works and in particular to tackle some of the problems which lone parents themselves face in regard to the making and enforcement of maintenance orders.

I intend to bring forward an amendment to the present Social Security Bill to give courts the power to make an order for recovery of benefit which can have regard to the income support personal allowance of the mother even where she is divorced or was never married. This will recognise her costs as child carer, and bring social security law more into line with family law.

I also intend to bring forward two further amendments to improve the working of maintenance orders themselves. The first will propose that DSS be given power to transfer to the lone parent an order which it has obtained, if she leaves benefit. This eliminates the need for her to make a fresh application for a maintenance order and means that she can take the maintenance for the child with her, if she wishes to go to work, thus reducing what has often been held to be a discouragement. The second will propose that DSS be given a power to seek enforcement of a claimant's own maintenance order if the absent parent fails to pay. These changes will reduce the need for the lone parent to take court action herself.

"Show You Care"

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that all training courses for social security officials include a showing of the National Speak Week video, "Show You Care."

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We are grateful to the right hon. Member for raising this matter. To ensure the National Speak Week video is seen by the widest possible audience of social security officials, we are arranging for copies of the video, and the accompanying notes, to be distributed to every local office. Managers will be encouraged to use the material during the many and varied training sessions which are held in those offices.

War Widows

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many war widows died in December 1989 and in January and February 1990; and if he has any information on the number of war widows who have died in March 1990.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The numbers notified as at 21 March are:

	Number
1989
December	416
1990
January	250
February	160
March	5

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State's reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, on 25 October 1989 what is the number of war widows who died in the year 1989.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of war widows who died in the year ended 31 December 1989 was 3,169.

Student Loans

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations his Department has had with organisations representing deaf people and organisations representing disabled students concerning the draft proposals for Social Security Benefits (Student Loans) Amendment Regulations and the definition used for disabled student.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Social Security Benefits (Student Loans) Amendment Regulations have been referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee which is currently consulting a variety of organisations including, we understand, organisations representing the interests of deaf and disabled people.

Residential Homes

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make it his policy, when reviewing the arrangements for determining his Department's rates applying to those living in private residential care, to ensure that those rates are not negotiated by his Department's staff, or local authority staff, who hold direct or indirect financial interests in such private residential homes;

(2) what rules apply to his Department's staff holding direct or indirect financial interests in private residential or nursing homes; and whether his Department's staff are required to register such financial interests for public inspection.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Central rules provide that civil servants must not put private interests before their duty to the state or put themselves in a position where duty and private interests conflict or make use of their official position to further those interests. Officers who have occasion to deal in an official capacity with any matter in which they have a private interest, are required to disclose that interest to a senior officer and ask that some other officer deals with the matter.

Additionally, in DSS, staff having significant face-to-face contact with the public are not normally permitted to undertake any private activity within the area covered by their office.

However, provided management is satisfied that it would be proper to do so, permission may exceptionally be given for staff to hold a financial interest in private residential or nursing homes if there are no more than six long-stay residents and the officer undertakes to produce and keep up to date a list of residents' names so that management may ensure that the officer has no official dealings with the home or its residents.

Taper System

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list in the Official Report any revisions he is making in the taper system for income support, family credit, housing benefit and community charge rebate, following the Chancellor's announcement of the increased savings threshold.

Mr. Scott: We believe that the present rules for taking account of capital holdings strikes the right balance between ensuring that state benefits are available to those with the greatest need and that personal thrift is not discouraged. We shall monitor carefully the effects of the changes to the upper capital limit to ensure this balance is maintained. The community charge benefit taper, whereby benefit entitlement is reduced by 15p for every £1 of income in excess of the applicable amount, is more generous than with the former rate rebate scheme.

Social Fund

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the numbers of applications (a) received and (b) approved for budgeting loans and crisis loans in each of the social security offices in Dunfermline, Kirkcaldy, Leven and Cowdenbeath for each month in 1989.

Mr. Scott: The information is in the Library.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the estimated expenditure on social fund budgeting and crisis loans and (b) the actual expenditure for each month between January 1989 and December 1989 inclusive for the Leven, Dunfermline, Cowdenbeath and Kirkcaldy Social Security offices.

Mr. Scott: The information given in the table represents the spending profile set at the start of each financial year for each office requested. The profile is adjusted at the end of each month to take account of actual expenditure and can be adjusted at any time to take account of local circumstances. Information for actual spending is in the Library.

Housing Benefit (Students)

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give calculations used to determine the student deduction as applied to student housing benefit claims; whether the student deduction as applied to student housing benefit claims is related to any index of housing costs; and what is the amount he intends to uprate the student deduction by for the 1990-91 academic year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The amount of the rent deduction applied to student housing benefit claims is determined on the basis of figures provided by the Department of Education and Science. The level of the rent deduction for the 1990-91 academic year will be determined on the same basis and will be known shortly.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state his reasons (a) for removing student entitlement to housing benefit and (b) for removing student entitlement to income support during periods of unemployment.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The Government believe that full-time students should be supported by the educational maintenance system and not by social security benefits. Access to benefits by students has been an unplanned product of social security changes over the last two decades, creating a disproportionate administrative burden on local offices and local authorities. The proposed new student loans and access funds will provide additional forms of support making it unnecessary for the majority of full-time students to have access to housing benefit and income support.

Additionally, we believe that it is inappropriate to treat students as unemployed when they are following a full-time course of study. Benefits for the unemployed are intended to provide financial support for people who are normally reliant on earnings when they face the unforeseen contingency of unemployment. Periods of study, and vacations between periods of study, cannot be classed as days of unemployment in the same way.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the total value and average weekly payment of housing benefit currently being claimed by claimants aged 18 to 24 years, (b) the total value of housing benefit paid to students in the academic year 1988-89 in each region of the country and (c) the projected number of claims for housing benefits, their total value and the average size of weekly claim in 1990 in each region of the country.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available in the detail requested. The average weekly amount of housing benefit for claimants aged 18 to 24, who were not also in receipt of income support, was £11·70 in May 1988. Similar information for claimants receiving both income support and housing benefit is not held. Housing benefit spending on claimants who are aged 18 to 24 is not identifiable within total expenditure.

Information on housing benefit paid to students is not available in the form requested and I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 5 March at column 535.

Spending plans and caseload estimates are on a Great Britain basis and for 1990-91 it is estimated that £4·6 billion in housing benefit will go to 4·2 million households. Average weekly amounts are not projected and deriving such amounts from the expenditure and caseload estimates does not produce a representative result.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number who would benefit each year if people receiving invalid care allowance were eligible for unemployment benefit when those they care for die, go into residential care or to hospital; and what would be the yearly cost.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Only those former carers who have received invalid care allowance for a period in excess of two and a half to three years would fail to qualify for unemployment benefit by virtue of a lack of recently paid national insurance contributions. As the average duration of invalid care allowance is approximately two years, most former carers who claim unemployment benefit qualify for it. Details of the numbers who fail to qualify for unemployment benefit are not available.

Disabled Students

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether all disabled students will retain entitlement to social security benefits following introduction of the loans scheme.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Disabled students will retain entitlement to most social security benefits on the same basis as now, including attendance allowance and mobility allowance. We propose that those students who meet the criteria for the disability premium will continue to be eligible for income support and housing benefit. Students who have received income support as a disabled student prior to the introduction of the new arrangements in the next academic year, will also retain eligibility to these benefits. We further propose that all full-time students will be excluded from unemployment benefit.

Local Government Finance (Rebates)

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward proposals to backdate the increase in capital exemptions for poll tax rebates announced in the Budget to cover Scotland in 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: My right hon. and learned Friend, the Secretary of State for Scotland, has announced a scheme of ex-gratia payments which will benefit an estimated 15,000 to 20,000 individual chargepayers. The scheme will be administered and paid for by my right hon. and learned Friend's Department.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Scotland had savings between £8,000 and £16,000 which had the effect of restricting their entitlement to income support and to poll tax rebate in 1989-90; and what the cost of such income support and rebates would be for those figures.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is estimated that some 15,000 to 20,000 individual chargepayers in Scotland in 1989-90, may have had, or shared, capital of between £8,000 and £16,000 which would have disentitled them from community charge rebates. The cost may have been up to £4 million. No estimates for income support are available.

Rates (Ex Gratia Payment)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make ex gratia payments to pensioners with limited savings in Northampton who did not receive a rate rebate in 1989-90.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Rate rebates were available to pensioners and others with savings of up to £8,000 in 1989-90. This limit will be doubled to £16,000 for rent rebates and allowances, and for the new community charge benefit, from April 1990. The new limit will not be retrospective.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what arrangements exist for compensating through the war pensions scheme ex-service men who took part in the British nuclear weapons test programme who subsequently developed cancerous diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is open to any ex-service man who suffers disablement which he considers to be due to service to make a claim for war pension.

As regards the British nuclear test programme, the rigorous safety precautions adopted were such that only a small proportion of the participants could have been exposed specifically to ionising radiation and that those who were exposed received only small radiation doses. Consequently the Government are confident that no one should have suffered harm as a result of exposure to ionising radiation.

However, in view of the concern which some participants had expressed in this matter, the Government commissioned in 1983 the independent National Radiological Protection Board to undertake a study of the health of the participants, investigating whether it showed any correlation with radiation exposure. Its report, published in 1988, concluded:

"small hazards of leukaemia and multiple myeloma may well have been associated with participation in the tests, but that such participation has not otherwise had a detectable effect on the participants' expectation of life or on their total risk of developing cancer."

Although the report showed a slight increase in the rate of occurrences of multiple myeloma and leukaemia, other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia, it did not establish any firm evidence of a causal relationship between increased incidence of any cancers and participation in the test programme.

Proof, however, is not essential for a claim to succeed under the war pensions scheme. There only needs to be reliable evidence which raises a reasonable doubt whether a condition is caused or aggravated by service. The Department's doctors are satisfied that the report's evidence does raise sufficient doubt in the case of participants suffering from multiple myeloma or leukaemia (other than chronic lymphatic leukaemia). Any claim to a war pension by such service men or the widows of such service men is therefore likely to succeed, and seven awards have been made.

The Report by the NRPB included data up to 1 January 1984. The NRPB has advised that, in order to provide a reliable assessment of the further accumulated data for the period 1 January 1984 to 1 January 1989, it would be necessary to conduct a full-scale validation and analysis exercise. In the light of this advice, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has set in hand a further study by the NRPB. I understand that it hopes to be in a position to report its findings by the end of 1991.

We shall await the NRPB's further report with interest and we shall take full account of the findings to the extent that they provide any additional information which might affect participants' entitlement to war pensions.

ENERGY

Coal Imports

6. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what forecast he has made for the likely level of coal imports in the year 2000.

Mr. Baldry: We do not make such forecasts.

29. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest figures for imported coal into Britain (a) by countries of origin and (b) amounts in each case.

Mr. Baldry: The latest information is as follows:

Quantity[1] (thousand tonnes)

Country of origin	Calendar year 1989	January 1990
United States of America	4,874	376
Australia	2,676	324
Poland	1,055	63
Colombia	874	45
Canada	729	184
China	450	1
South Africa	346	12
Federal Republic of Germany	259	32
Netherlands	200	112
USSR	181	9
Panama	106	—
Venezuela	86	—
Belgium	78	13
Norway	58	3
France	50	—
Other countries	116	21
Total	12,137	1,194
of which:
coking coal	7,998	825
steam coal	3,374	291
anthracite	765	78

[1] Figures are rounded independently and totals may therefore differ from the sum of their constituent parts.

Source: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise.

37. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the level of imports of coal in 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Baldry: We do not make such estimates.

Renewable Energy

16. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of power generation originates from renewable sources.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In 1989, about 2 per cent. of electricity was generated from renewable sources in Great Britain.

39. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what specific measures Her Majesty's Government are carrying out to encourage research, and operation of, wind, solar and other alternative sources of energy.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government are supporting a major research and development programme aimed at developing commercially viable and environmentally acceptable renewable energy technologies to contribute to future energy supply.

49. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest assessment of the potential of wind-generated electricity in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The most recent estimate of the potential of wind-generated electricity in the United Kingdom was published in energy paper No. 55, copies of which are in the Libraries of the House. The extent to which this renewable source of energy might be developed commercially within environmental constraints is not yet known, but energy paper No. 55 has estimated that by the year 2025 wind energy might provide up to 30 TWh per year of electricity which represents about 10 per cent. of current electricity requirements.

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what initiatives his Department is taking to develop commercially viable and environmentally acceptable forms of renewable technology.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government are supporting a major research and development programme aimed at developing commercially viable and environmentally acceptable renewable energy technologies to contribute to future energy supply.

Bankside Power Station

14. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the capital value of Bankside power station.

Mr. Wakeham: The estimated value of this site is commercially confidential.

34. Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the future use of Bankside power station.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department has received representations on behalf of one project.

35. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the ownership of Bankside power station and Sudbury house.

Mr. Wakeham: I am consulting the CEGB and those other parties which have a locus under the provisions of the Electricity Act 1989 about my proposed modifications to the board's transfer scheme, including the reallocation to Nuclear Electric of the Bankside power station site and Sudbury house.

Electricity Privatisation

15. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the gross Exchequer costs of electricity supply industry privatisation.

Mr. Wakeham: It is too early to make any estimate of the likely gross costs of privatising the electricity supply industry, but the costs will be small in comparison with the proceeds.

25. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had with the European Commissioner for competition in relation to the privatisation of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Wakeham: I and my Department have had a number of discussions with the Commission on electricity privatisation.

58. Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received from large consumers of electricity about his plans for privatisation of the electricity industry.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend continues to receive representations on electricity privatisation from a wide range of interested parties.

Low-sulphur Coal

17. Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most-up-to-date estimate of the level of imports of low-sulphur coal in 1990, 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Wakeham: We do not make such estimates.

Home Insulation

18. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to review the amount of grant now paid towards home insulation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend is taking powers in the Social Security Bill which, if approved, will lead to the introduction of a new scheme of grants for energy efficiency measures in low-income households. The amount of grant payable to an individual applicant under the scheme will depend upon the work undertaken; the allowable maximum still has to be settled.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

19. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to reduce United Kingdom emissions of carbon dioxide from power stations.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department's programmes to promote energy efficiency and renewable energy and our support of nuclear power will all help to reduce future emissions of CO_2. The non-fossil fuel obligation on the privatised electricity supply industry will further promote the development of technologies which do not emit CO_2.

59. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to (a) publish and (b) achieve CO_2 emission reduction targets for the energy sector.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The United Kingdom, along with other industrialised nations, was a party to the Noordwijk declaration on atmospheric pollution and climatic change in November 1989, which stated that emissions of greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide, should be stabilised at a level and on a time scale to be considered by the intergovernmental panel on climate change and by the second world climate conference in November 1990. That remains the position.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the level of carbon dioxide emission reductions in the United Kingdom estimated to be possible by 2005 and 2020 due to energy efficiency, renewable energy sources, nuclear power, or the increased use of natural gas.

Mr. Peter Morrison: An indication of the extent to which some technical options in isolation can contribute to reducing carbon dioxide emissions together with their associated costs is provided in the study (chapter 5), "An Evaluation of Energy—related Greenhouse Gas Emissions and Measures to Ameliorate Them". Further consideration of the economic costs of the various options will need to be made in due course.

Lead-free Petrol

20. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of petrol sold in Britain is lead-free; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Currently about 30 per cent. of petrol sold is unleaded. This is an increase from 4 per cent. in January 1989.

41. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the increase in the consumption of unleaded petrol in the east midlands in the last six months; and how many petrol pumps have been converted for unleaded petrol.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Regional information on the consumption of unleaded petrol is not available centrally. However, United Kingdom deliveries of unleaded petrol increased by 23 per cent. between July 1989 and January 1990, from 23 per cent. of total petrol deliveries in July 1989 to 30 per cent. in January 1990.

No information is available on how many petrol pumps have been converted for unleaded petrol, but the Institute of Petroleum estimates that over 90 per cent. of retail petrol outlets now sell unleaded petrol.

Nottinghamshire Coalfield

21. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the rate of productivity growth in the Nottinghamshire coalfield.

Mr. Baldry: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) earlier today.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

22. Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the completion of the flue gas desulphurisation programme of the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Wakeham: I have received a number of representations on this, mainly as a result of misunderstandings about the requirements of the EC large combustion plants directive.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the date by which flue gas desulphurisation will be in operation at each of the power stations in England and Wales which are of 1,500 MW capacity or more.

Mr. Baldry: The EC large combustion plants directive —to which the Government are fully committed—does not require every station to be so fitted. The FGD plant at Drax is expected to come fully on stream by the end of 1996.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what reasons have been given to the member states of the Community with regard to the delay in the provision of desulphurisation equipment at the larger power stations.

Mr. Baldry: The Government are committed to achieving the reductions in emissions specified in the EC large combustion plants directive. There has been no delay in planning to meet this commitment. The fitting of flue gas desulphurisation equipment to power stations will play an important part in achieving the emissions reductions required by the directive. Contracts have already been placed for FGD at the 4GW Drax power station and further retrofits are in prospect. Other measures will also contribute.

Gas Transmission (North Sea)

24. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has had any recent applications for delivery transmission systems, for gas, in the North sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No formal applications of this kind have been received recently.

Energy Conservation

26. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what new measures are being put forward by the Government to encourage energy conservation in the home and place of work.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Energy Efficiency Office is continuing to promote energy efficiency in the domestic, commercial and industrial sectors through a number of programmes aimed at energy consumers, professional advisers and decision makers. Recent initiatives include the best practice programme, which aims to provide authoritative and targeted information on a wide range of energy efficiency measures and applications, and the proposed new scheme of grants for insulation measures in the homes of those on low incomes.

Nuclear Electric

27. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the allocation of Central Electricity Generating Board property to Nuclear Electric plc.

45. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received about the allocation of Central Electricity Generating Board land at Druridge bay and Pembroke to Nuclear Electric plc.

Mr. Baldry: I have received representations from interested parties, including hon. Members.

33. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the assets and liabilities of Nuclear Electric.

Mr. Baldry: My hon. Friend laid a minute before the House on 6 March relating to Nuclear Electric's financial position. Some Members have signed an early-day motion objecting to the minute. I have received various representations on other matters.

51. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date valuation of the assets and liabilities of proposed Nuclear Electric plc.

Mr. Baldry: Nuclear Electric will inherit assets and liabilities from the CEGB on vesting day. The latest valuation is reflected in the CEGB's report and accounts for 1988-89, a copy of which is in the Library. The company will review the valuations before the publication of its own accounts later in the year.

Energy Efficiency

28. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what energy savings targets have been set in connection with the various initiatives being undertaken by the Energy Efficiency Office.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Targets for the Energy Efficiency Office's programmes are set out in chapter 5, paragraphs 44 to 46 of the 1990 Public Expenditure White Paper (Cm. 1005).

40. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has made an assessment of the environmental implications resulting from the reduction in real terms of the budget of the Energy Efficiency Office.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Energy Efficiency Office's activities have always been targeted to maximise their effectiveness in stimulating improvements in energy efficiency. Such improvements are not only economically attractive but environmentally beneficial.

56. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to increase the budget of the Energy Efficiency Office.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The budget of the Energy Efficiency Office is being substantially increased in 1990-91 to accommodate expenditure under the proposed home energy efficiency scheme. Powers for the new scheme, which will offer grants towards the cost of insulation measures in low income households, are included in the Social Security Bill currently before Parliament.

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will abolish the Energy Efficiency Office.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No.

Electricity Prices

30. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received regarding the rise in electricity prices from 1 April 1990.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about electricity prices.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has made an estimate of the contribution of the rises in domestic electricity prices in April 1990 to the retail prices index.

Mr. Baldry: It is estimated that the increases in electricity prices effective from April 1990 should add between 0·20 per cent. and 0·25 per cent. to the retail prices index once the tariffs have been fully implemented.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has discussed the implications of articles 85 and 86 of the treaty of Rome for the new pricing structure of the electricity supply industry of England and Wales with the European Commissioner responsible for competition, in respect of (a) domestic and (b) industrial consumers.

Mr. Baldry: The European Commission has been kept fully informed of all aspects of the Government's proposals for electricity privatisation.

National Power

31. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he is carrying out regarding the appointment of the chairman of National Power.

Mr. Wakeham: I am carrying out such consultations as I consider appropriate.

53. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of National Power regarding possible generation of electricity using gas.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chief executive of National Power regularly to discuss many aspects of his business.

Oil and Gas Exploration

32. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the likely level of drilling on the United Kingdom continental shelf in 1990.

47. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his estimate of the likely level of drilling on the United Kingdom continental shelf in 1990.

Mr. Peter Morrison: A recent survey of company intentions by my Department showed that a record number of more than 200 exploration and appraisal wells could be drilled in the United Kingdom continental shelf this year.

38. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has for the reduction of the number of fallow blocks on the United Kingdom continental shelf in 1990.

54. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has for the reduction of the number of fallow blocks on the United Kingdom continental shelf in 1990.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As I indicated in my reply on 26 February to my hon. Friends the Members for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) and for Broxtowe, (Mr. Lester), I am pressing forward with the fallow block initiative. I will be keeping in close touch through 1990 with the licensees concerned, and I will be encouraging them to continue the good progress made in 1989 in reducing the number of fallow blocks.

43. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many significant discoveries of oil and gas were made on the United Kingdom continental shelf during 1989.

52. Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many significant discoveries of oil and gas were made on the United Kingdom continental shelf during 1989.

55. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many significant discoveries of oil and gas were made on the United Kingdom continental shelf during 1989.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Twenty-nine significant discoveries, comprising nine of oil, 13 of gas, four of oil and gas, two of gas and condensate and one of condensate were made on the United Kingdom continental shelf in 1989, the highest total in any one year since offshore activity began in 1964.

57. Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many of the wells drilled on the United Kingdom continental shelf have been drilled (a) since 1964 and (b) since 1979.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) earlier today.

Electricity Supply

36. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next proposes to discuss reciprocal electricity supplies sharing and purchase arrangements between EEC member states with his counterparts in the Council of Energy Ministers.

Mr. Wakeham: Sharing and purchase arrangements for electricity supplies within the Community are for the electricity industries. However, the Energy Council on 21 May is likely to consider the Commission proposal for a directive on electricity transit. The directive seeks to reduce barriers to transit and thus promote interstate trade in electricity.

British Coal

42. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal; and what were the principal matters which were discussed.

Mr. Wakeham: I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

44. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the numbers employed by British Coal in 1990, 1991 and 1992.

60. Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his most up-to-date estimate of the manpower figures for British Coal in 1990-91.

Mr. Baldry: The Government do not make estimates of future manpower levels in British Coal. Such levels depend on a number of factors, including the corporation's continued ability to raise its competitiveness.

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much the Government have invested in British Coal since 1979.

Mr. Baldry: Since 1979 the Government have invested over £6·5 billion in the coal industry and continue to invest at a rate of over £2 million every working day.

Offshore Energy Industry

46. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the level of employment in the offshore oil and gas industry in each of the years from 1983 to 1989.

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the level of employment in the offshore oil and gas industry in each of the years from 1983 to 1989.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson) earlier today.

61. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the level of capital investment in the North sea in 1989; and what are the prospects for 1990.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 16 March, Official Report, column 397.

62. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association; and what was discussed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I meet the representatives of the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association (UKOOA) regularly to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Electricity Undertakings (Property)

48. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the proposed proportion of property assets to total assets of (a) Nuclear Electric, (b) National Power, (c) PowerGen and (d) the National Grid Company.

Mr. Baldry: The Central Electricity Generating Board submitted on 12 March a scheme for transferring all the board's property, rights and liabilities to successor companies. Subject to my approval and any modifications this scheme will come into force on 31 March. My Department is now considering the board's scheme, which is commercially confidential, and is undertaking the consultations called for by statute.

Landfill Gas Schemes

50. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many landfill gas schemes are in operation.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Currently, 35 landfill gas schemes are operational and a further 30 are being planned. The estimate of current energy savings is 150,000 tonnes coal equivalent per annum (tcepa). Of the existing schemes, 13 are generating electricity with a capacity of 16 MW.

National Union of Mineworkers

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to meet the president of the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Wakeham: I am always happy to meet officers of the coal mining unions at their request.

National Society for Clean Air

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met representatives from the National Society for Clean Air; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have had no meetings with the National Society for Clean Air.

Nuclear Reactors (Accidents)

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations his Department has recently had to improve emergency planning procedures to deal with a civil nuclear reactor accident.

Mr. Baldry: The Department regularly consults organisations concerned with all aspects of civil nuclear emergency planning. This is done under the auspices of the nuclear emergency planning liaison group, which brings together representatives of Government Departments, the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate (NII) the National Radiological Protection Board, nuclear operators, the police, local authorities and the fire service. My Department is also a member of the nuclear emergency arrangements forum where matters of common interest are discussed between the nuclear operators, the NII and Government Departments. In addition, the Department participates in ad-hoc meetings with various organisations from time to time to consider particular aspects of planning.

Electricity Bill Estimates

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many complaints he has received from consumer organisations over the practice of electricity boards estimating fuel use when access to meters is readily available.

Mr. Baldry: The Department of Energy receives representations from consumer organisations from time to time on a wide range of issues including estimated billing. However, this is a matter for the industry.

Coal Contracts

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to receive the notification of approval or otherwise from the European Commission regarding the coal contracts agreed between British Coal and National Power and PowerGen.

Mr. Wakeham: I hope that the Commission will be able to respond favourably in due course to the arrangements notified to it.

Lord Marshall of Goring

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met Lord Marshall of Goring in his capacity as chairman of the CEGB; and what was discussed.

Mr. Wakeham: I met Lord Marshall regularly as chairman of the CEGB. The discussions at such meetings are confidential.

Cornwall Energy Project

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what support has been given to the Cornwall energy project.

Mr. Peter Morrison: My Department has contributed 25 per cent. of the cost—some £80,000—to the Cornwall energy project conducted by Cornwall county council.

National Grid Company

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he can yet estimate the extent to which industrial energy producers will increase their rates to the National Grid Company after privatisation.

Mr. Baldry: Prices will depend on market conditions and the specific details of any relevant contracts.

Gas and Electricity Prices

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on (a) the percentage increase and (b) the real increase in the price of gas and electricity over the past five years.

Mr. Wakeham: The increases for domestic and industrial consumers are shown in the following tables:

Domestic Sector

Percentage changes between the 4th quarter of 1984 and the 4th quarter of 1989

	Current prices	Deflated prices[1]
Gas	+11	−15
Electricity	+21	− 8

[1] Deflated using the GDP (market prices) deflator. The GDP deflator for the 4th quarter of 1989 has been estimated using the change in the retail prices index (all items).

Source: Fuel price indices published in Tables 19 and 20 of Energy Trends.

Industrial sector

Percentage changes between the 3rd quarter of 1984 and the 3rd quarter of 1989

	Current prices	Deflated prices[1]
Gas	−20	−39
Electricity	+18	− 9

[1] Deflated using the GDP (market prices) deflator. The GDP deflator for the 4th quarter of 1989 has been estimated using the change in the retail prices index (all items).

Source: Fuel price indices published in tables 19 and 20 of Energy Trends.

Chemical Spillages (North Sea)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many complaints there have been regarding spillages or discharges of chemicals from North sea oil and gas installations over the last five years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There have been no complaints concerning spillages or discharges of chemicals from North Sea oil and gas installations over the last five years.

However, following the Piper Alpha incident, several queries were received concerning the PCBs present in equipment on the installation.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many prosecutions there have been for the spillage or discharge of chemicals from North sea oil and gas installations over the last five years.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There have been no prosecutions for spillage or discharge of chemicals from North sea oil and gas installations over the last five years.

Nuclear Industry (Work-related Diseases)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received, and from whom, concerning employees in the nuclear industry and work-related diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: I have received a number of representations from the public and from Members of this House concerning this matter.

Natural Gas

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current production of natural gas from the United Kingdom sector of the North sea in million tonnes of oil equivalnt; and what is the projected use of natural gas by 2005 and 2020 outlined in the range of scenarios produced in the study "An Evaluation of Energy-related Greenhouse Gas Emissions and Measures to Ameliorate Them".

Mr. Peter Morrison: Gas production from United Kingdom fields in 1988—the last year for which full data is available—was approximately 39 million tonnes oil equivalent (MTOE). Primary gas demand in the study referred to was estimated to range between 59 and 100 MTOE in 2005 and between 72 and 169 MTOE in 2020. This range of estimates was based on price assumptions provided by the International Energy Agency.

Greenhouse Effect

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy to whom the departmental study for the IPCC "An Evaluation of Energy-related Greenhouse Gas Emissions and Measures to Ameliorate Them", has been circulated for peer review external to the Department.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The study has not been subject to formal peer review. It was undertaken at the specific request of the energy and industry subgroup of the response strategies working group of the IPCC, and given to it at the end of November 1989. In the preparation of the study, a number of groups within and outside Government were consulted, and some provided input. Much of the data used was from published sources.

The Department's advisory council on R and D for fuel and power (ACORD) will discuss the study shortly.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to update the departmental study for the IPCC "An Evaluation of Energy-related Greenhouse Gas Emissions and Measures to Ameliorate Them", to include new information and data, and to take account of critical reviews received since its publication.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have no plans to update this study. It was carried out as a response to a specific request from the energy and industry subgroup of the response strategies working group of the IPCC for material to assist the work of that subgroup. The work of the subgroup is expected to be completed before the end of April.

Sizewell

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what were the original overall costs for the development programme at Sizewell; and what are his latest projected costs figures.

Mr. Baldry: The Sizewell B project was sanctioned by the CEGB on 1 April 1987 at a cost of £1,691 million. The board's most recent estimate, derived from evidence given to the Hinkley Point C inquiry in September 1989, is £1,870 million at 1987 prices.

French Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if either the French Government or Electricité de France have informed him of any risk or failure at nuclear power stations situated on or near the northern coast of France;

(2) if he will consult both the French Government and Electricité de France to ensure that arrangements exist for notificaion in case of serious risk or failure at northern nuclear power stations in France;

(3) what discussions he has had with the French Government or with Electricité de France in regard to the safety of nuclear power stations that are close to the northern coast of France.

Mr. Baldry: There are continuing contacts between my officials and those of the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate and their French counterparts.

The nuclear installations inspectorate has an exchange of information arrangement with the French nuclear safety regulatory body—Service Central de Sureté des Installations Nucléaires (SCSIN)—which includes the exchange of safety-related information.

There is no reason to suppose that the standards of safety adopted by the French are any less rigorous than those applied in the United Kingdom.

Arrangements already exist, under a bilateral treaty with the French Government, for Her Majesty's Government to be notified of any accidental release of radioactivity from a French nuclear installation. In addition, the French Government are a party to the early international notification arrangements established by the International Atomic Energy Agency and the European Community.

An independent means of detecting and monitoring any abnormal increases in environmental radioactivity of the kind which might stem from an overseas nuclear accident is provided by the radioactive incident monitoring network (RIMNET).

Magnox Fuel

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the volume of intermediate-level waste that is generated due to the reprocessing of spent fuel for each of the fuel types Magnox, advanced gas reactor and pressurised water reactor.

Mr. Baldry: I understand from British Nuclear Fuels plc that the volumes of intermediate level wastes, conditioned for disposal, generated from the reprocessing of spent fuel are approximately as follows:

2·00 cubic metres per tonne of uranium of Magnox fuel reprocessed.
2·25 cubic metres per tonne of uranium of advanced gas reactor fuel reprocessed.
1·25 cubic metres per tonne of uranium of pressurised water reactor fuel reprocessed.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what are the countries of origin for foreign Magnox fuel that has been reprocessed in the United Kingdom;

(2) what is the tonnage of foreign Magnox fuel which has been reprocessed in this country, for each country of origin, for each of the years from 1965 to 1990, inclusive; and what are the projected tonnages to 1999.

Mr. Baldry: For the tonnages of civil spent fuel which have been reprocessed in this country, I refer the hon. Member to the answers given by the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 27 May 1977 at column 626, by my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 11 December 1985 at columns 638-39 and by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) on 1 February 1988 at columns 473-74. Some 10 per cent. of these quantities have been Magnox spent fuel from Italy or Japan. Quantities for future years are dependent upon reactor life times.

Estate Agents

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what factors he takes into account in deciding whether to appoint estate agents as advisers in major privatisations.

Mr. Wakeham: In any privatisation it is important to ensure that the property portfolios are properly documented and valued. This is the role of the valuers which the hon. Member chooses to describe as estate agents. It is a fundamental step in the process of establishing a realistic valuation of the undertaking as a whole and obtaining value for the assets in proceeds. This is consistent with the advice of the National Audit office to the Public Accounts Committee.

DEFENCE

Admirals

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish a table showing the number of admirals in the Royal Navy expressed as a proportion of the number of vessels in the Royal Navy fleet in 1960, 1970, 1980 and 1990.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The numbers of admirals receiving full active pay and of vessels in the Royal Navy on 1 April in the following years were:

Year	[1]Admirals	Vessels	Ratio
1960	84	447	1:5·3
1970	68	239	1:3·5
1980	59	182	1:3·1
1990	[2]53	173	1:3·3

[1] Rear admiral and above.

[2] At 1 January.

In the modern Royal Navy, there is no direct relationship between the number of admirals and ships. The former is primarily governed by the needs of the shore organisation, including headquarters, and international commitments.

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many former members of the Army information service at headquarters, Northern Ireland have been interviewed by Government agencies about Mr. Colin Wallace's allegations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A number of officials were interviewed by the police in the course of investigations into Kincora.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will direct his officials to interview Mr. Mike Taylor and Miss Wendy Austin about the full scope of their activities in Army information services in Northern Ireland in the 1970s.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. If Mr. Taylor or Miss Austin have information about activities in Northern Ireland which they feel to be of significance, they should submit it to the RUC or to the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his written answer to the hon. Member for Brent, East, Official Report, 6 May 1988, column 621, if he will place in the Library copies of all printed material designed and printed at Army headquarters, Northern Ireland, and disseminated to the public from 1972 to 1975.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what security exercises were carried out by the Army information department in Northern Ireland in the 1970s.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to my letter of 30 January to the hon. Member for Brent, East.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which section of his Department was responsible for psychological warfare operations and psychological warfare training for civil servants in Northern Ireland from 1971 to the current date.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answers given by my hon. Friend the former Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member on 6 May 1988 at column 622.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letters from the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton), to the hon. Member for Brent, East on 30 January and 2 February.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. A copy of my letter of 30 January is already in the Library of the House. I did not write to the hon. Member on 2 February. A copy of the letter which the Secretary of State for Defence wrote to him on that date is already in the Library of the House.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letters from the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), to the hon. Member for Brent East on 18 April 1988, 21 June 1988 and 15 August 1988 concerning Mr. Colin Wallace and related matters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No. Copies of the letters of 21 June and 15 August 1988 are already in the Library of the House. A copy of the letter of 18 April 1988 will also be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the written answer to the hon. Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) of 30 January, Official Report, column 112, whether Army intelligence material was used in the Clockwork Orange project.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to my reply of 30 January to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) at columns 110-13.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the written answer to the hon. Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) of 30 January, Official Report, column 112, if he will place in the Library copies of all documents relating to the project Clockwork Orange.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the written answer to the hon. Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) of 30 January, Official Report, column 111, what investigations were carried out to discover whether Mr. Wallace was given a supplementary directive or job description; what was the security classification given to Mr. Wallace's responsibilities; and where Mr. Colin Wallace was interviewed in January 1975 about the use of forged documents for disinformation purposes.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to earlier statements about Mr. Wallace's job description. I am unable to identify the interview to which the hon. Member has referred.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, whether (a) Mr. Peter Broderick or (b) Mr. Michael Taylor were ever interviewed by any official or Government agency in connection with allegations made by Mr. Colin Wallace.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I understand that, during the inquiries into Kincora, both Mr. Broderick and Mr. Taylor were interviewed by the RUC, Mr. Broderick on 7 June 1982 and 8 November 1985, Mr. Taylor on 9 June 1982.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Mr. Colin Wallace carried out any psychological operations warfare whilst working in Army information services Northern Ireland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to my previous statements made in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel (Mr. Marshall) on 30 January at columns 110-13 and during the Adjournment debates on 6 and 12 February at columns 866-68 and columns 115-22.

Sea Harrier

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the Sea Harrier FRS 1 aircraft presently being operated by the Royal Navy are to be modified so as to reach FRS 2 standard.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is currently planned that 29 of the Royal Navy's present Sea Harrier FRS 1 aircraft will be modified to FRS 2 standard. There will also be two development aircraft, making a total of 31.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the first new build Sea Harrier FRS 2 aircraft will be delivered to the Royal Navy.

Mr. Alan Clark: Deliveries will begin in early 1994.

European Fighter Aircraft

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has commissioned any studies into the effect on the European fighter aircraft project if the Federal Republic of Germany or its successor withdraws its support.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. My right hon. Friend and his German counterpart agreed on 22 January that there was a need for a modern fighter aircraft and the EFA was the best solution to meet the requirements of our air forces in the second half of the 1990s and beyond.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what indemnities he has signed or proposes to sign in favour of companies located in Federal Germany in relation to the European fighter aircraft; if he will place copies in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The arrangements for companies involved in the EFA programme are contained in the development MOU signed by all the four participating nations in November 1988.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies he has commissioned into the requirements of the Royal Air Force in the event of the European fighter aircraft being cancelled.

Mr. Alan Clark: We do not expect the European fighter aircraft programme to be cancelled.

Type 23 Frigate

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the development by Yarrow Shipbuilders of a stretched version of the type 23 frigate.

Mr. Neubert: Following our withdrawal from the NFR90 project, my Department is considering alternative means of replacing the type 42 destroyers with a ship capable of deploying the support defence missile system. This consideration will include the suitability of existing warship platforms, such as the type 23.

SSN20 Submarine

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the introduction of competition into the project definition phase for the SSN20 submarine.

Mr. Neubert: No decision has been made on the project definition phase for the next class of fleet nuclear-powered submarines. In line with current defence procurement policy, we intend making the maximum possible use of competition in this programme.

SRAAM

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to announce a decision for full-scale development of the advanced short range air-to-air missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are currently considering the way forward with our international partners and with industry. I do not expect to announce a decision for some time.

Married Quarters (Woolwich)

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Army married quarters in the Woolwich area are currently empty; and how many of these have been empty for (a) up to six months, (b) up to 12 months and (c) longer than 12 months.

Mr. Neubert: There are currently 91 empty Army married quarters in the Woolwich area out of a total stock of 690; 67 have been empty for up to six months, 19 for up to 12 months and five for longer than 12 months. Of these, the majority are either already allocated to service families, who will be moving in shortly, or are awaiting major maintenance work. In addition, there are 54 flats in the process of sale, of which 51 have been vacant for longer than 12 months and three for up to 12 months.

Mr. John Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Army married quarters in the Woolwich area have been offered for sale during the past 12 months; how many have been sold; and to what type of buyer they have been sold.

Mr. Neubert: A total of 81 ex-Army married quarters in the Woolwich area have been offered for sale during the past 12 months. Of these 27 have been sold to the London borough of Greenwich, and we are currently negotiating the sale of the remaining 54 properties.

Sandown Class Minehunters

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when tenders are to be sought for the next batch of Sandown class role minehunters for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Neubert: Tenders have been invited today for up to seven vessels of this class.

Procurement Executive (Location)

Mr. Aspinwall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future location of his Department's Procurement Executive.

Mr. Neubert: As a result of the studies we have carried out over the past 18 months, we have now decided to proceed as follows. The Procurement Executive's land and air systems controllerates, the ordnance board, and associated work of the Director General of Defence Contracts will be moved from London to Keynsham, east Bristol in 1993. Collocation in the same travel-to-work area of the sea systems controllerate, the majority of whose staff currently work in Bath, will be tackled progressively and completed as soon as practicable thereafter. In this way, we shall achieve the collocation in the same travel-to-work area of the bulk of the Procurement Executive's project management activities.

The controllerates currently comprise some 3,800 posts in London, of which up to 1,100 are non-mobile grades. In addition, there are a further 1,100 sea systems posts currently located in Portsmouth and Weymouth, of which some 200 are non-mobile grades. We would expect to recruit locally such replacements as are necessary to fill the non-mobile posts.

A large number of options was considered for these moves. The Bristol-Bath solution proved to be the most economically attractive, both in terms of initial outlay, and of savings in running costs, which are expected to amount to over £50 million a year once the programme is complete. It is well placed in relation to the operational needs of the staff concerned for frequent direct contacts with Ministry of Defence headquarters, with the defence research establishments, and with contractors.

Collocation in the same travel-to-work area will enable us to offer our staff better career prospects without further domestic disruption, will lead to reduced costs, and improved efficiency and professionalism in the short term while providing us with the flexibility we require to adapt the Procurement Executive to future needs.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Rule 43

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of prisoners currently on rule 43, own protection, by individual prison establishment.

Mr. Mellor: The information is given in the table:

Drugs

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used to measure the cost-effectiveness of programmes dealing with drug misuse and, in particular (i) drug enforcement programmes, (ii) education programmes to reduce demand, (iii) treatment programmes and (iv) court disposals for drug abusers including those convicted of both possession and supply.

Mr. Mellor: It is difficult to measure the cost-effectiveness of different programmes designed to tackle drug misuse; the most that can often be achieved is to estimate the costs of the programme and measure certain of its intermediate outputs. Wagstaff and Maynard, in their 1985 study of economic aspects of the illicit drug market and drug enforcement policies in the United Kingdom (published as Home Office research study 95), undertook some preliminary economic analysis of the drug enforcement activities of the police and customs, and constructed a number of different cost-effectiveness indices. A Home Office research study, planned to start later this year, will seek to estimate the cost of each of the different aspects of the Government's strategy against drugs.

Private Security Firms

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to legislate to enforce stricter controls on the setting up of private security firms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have no such plans at present. We are currently considering, in the light of the report of a Home Office working group on self-regulation of the private security industry, what further action needs to be taken.

Elvet Prison (Suicides)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners on remand and how many who have been sentenced have committed suicide in Her Majesty's prison, Elvet, Durham, during the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: The table shows the number of inmates who have died at Her Majesty's prison, Durham since 1985. All these deaths were confirmed as suicide at a coroner's inquest. There have been two deaths at the prison so far in 1990, both of convicted inmates, but an inquest has been held in neither case. One of these deaths is thought to have been suicide.

Replica Firearms

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to introduce legislation to prohibit the sale and ownership of replica firearms.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Under the Firearms Act 1982, the sale and possession of replica firearms which can be readily converted to fire live ammunition are subject to the same level of stringent control as that imposed on real firearms by the Firearms Acts 1968 and 1988. We have no plans to control the sale and possession of imitation firearms which cannot be so converted.

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter from the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) to the hon. Member for Brent, East on 2 February about Mr. Colin Wallace.

Mr. John Patten: The text of my reply of 12 February 1990 to the hon. Member for Brent, East is as follows:

> "I am writing in response to points you raised about the case of Mr. Colin Wallace, and the allegation that Mr. Wallace was wrongfully convicted.
>
> You will be aware that the Home Secretary carefully considered the material advanced to support that allegation and announced his decision in a written Answer to Mr. Michael Marshall MP on 30 January. In amplification of that Answer the Home Secretary placed a memorandum in the Library. I enclose for ease of reference a copy of the reply and memorandum.
> I would draw attention particularly to paragraph 2 of the memorandum. The points which you and Mr. Wallace raised are matters which were either considered at the trial or which could have been raised at the trial had Mr. Wallace and his advisers so wished.
> You asked in your Question in the House on 15 January whether the Home Secretary would institute an inquiry into the conduct of the Sussex police force when investigating the murder charge against Mr. Colin Wallace. We can see no grounds for such an investigation."

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who interviewed Mr. Peter Broderick and Mr. Michael Taylor in 1980 about Mr. Wallace's manslaughter case.

Mr. John Patten: I understand from the chief constable of Sussex that Mr. Peter Broderick and Mr. Michael Taylor were seen by detectives of that police force involved in the inquiry in 1980 into the death of Jonathan Lewis, in respect of whom Mr. Wallace was convicted of manslaughter.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many personal licences were in force for (a) 1987, (b) 1988, and (c) 1989 under the terms of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; under what circumstances personal licences are revoked; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The latest available information, for 1987 and 1988, was published in the annual report of the Animal Procedures Committee for 1988 (HC 458; p3). The figures for 1989 will be published in the committee's report for 1989. The most usual reason for revoking a licence is that the holder no longer requires it. The conditions attaching to personal licences and the circumstances in which they may be revoked are set out in "Guidance on the Operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986" (HC 182), published this year.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what criteria he employs to determine whether animal experiments merit the granting of a project licence under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986;

(2) what steps he takes to establish whether alternative methods of testing exist before granting a project licence under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to refuse entirely applications for licences in any category of work. "Guidance on the Operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986" (HC 182 of 1990), published on 15 February, sets out the criteria he follows, in accordance with section 5 of the Act, in determining whether and on what terms to grant a project licence, including the consideration which has been given by the applicant to alternatives. The reports of the Animals Procedures Committee for 1988 (HC 498 of 1989) and 1987 (HC 36 of 1988) set out the advice of the committee, which my right hon. and learned Friend has gratefully accepted, on the consideration of applications for project licences for the testing of cosmetics. We look forward to receiving further advice from the committee on this subject.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reasons he ascribes to the increase in the number of experiments performed on animals in respect of safety tests for (a) environmental pollution, (b) substances used in agriculture, (c) substances used in industry, (d) substances used in the household, (e) food additives, (f) cosmetics and toiletries and (g) alcohol research between 1987 and 1988; what steps he plans to take to reduce the number of such animal experiments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: "Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals Great Britain 1988" (Cm 743) sets out the available information on the increases or decreases in the numbers of safety tests under different headings. "Guidance on the Operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986" (HC 182 of 1990) sets out the criteria which my right hon. and learned Friend follows in determining whether and under what conditions to grant a project licence.

Shops Act 1950

Mr. Janman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for each of the last five years, how many fines have been imposed upon stores which have traded in breach of the Shops Act 1950; and what is the total for each year of the fines imposed.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 19 March]: Information for 1984 to 1988 is given in the table. Data for 1989 will not be available until autumn 1990.

Defendents fined for offences against the Shops Act 1950
England and Wales

Year	Total fined	Total amount fined (£)
1984	785	114,410
1985	632	150,346
1986	598	185,851
1987	568	147,095
1988	441	99,730

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the extra revenues from a further (i) 5p, (ii) 7½p and (iii) 10p on the standard and higher rate of income tax, at current yields; and what would be the annual extra amounts a married man with two children aged under 11 years would pay on annual earnings of (1) £8,000, (2) £10,000, (3) £12,000 and (4) £14,000 if the tax rate were raised by (a) 5p, (b) 7½p or (c) 10p.

Mr. Lilley: Information is in the tables. The figures reflect independent taxation and the levels of allowances and thresholds announced in the 1990 Budget. Estimates in table 1 are based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are provisional. They do not take account of the consequential effects on capital gains tax.

Table 1: Revenue yield in a full year of increases in the basic and higher rates of income tax, at 1990-91 levels of income

Increase in basic and higher rates	Yield (£ billion)
(a) 5 pence on both	10·2
(b) 7½ pence on both	15·4
(c) 10 pence on both	20·5

Table 2: Increase in tax liability for 1990-91 of married man[1]—£1 per year

Earnings	Increase in both basic and higher rates[2] of income tax:
	5 pence	7½ pence	10 pence
8,000	163·75	245·63	327·50
10,000	263·75	395·63	527·50
12,000	363·75	545·63	727·50
14,000	463·75	695·63	927·50

[1] Calculations assume that the married man has no other forms of income and that he does not receive any tax allowances or reliefs other than the personal allowance plus the married couple's allowance. Child benefit is not affected by the proposed tax changes.

[2] At the levels of earnings given, higher rate tax would not apply.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a list of all those state benefits and payments which are taxable, giving the number of tax units paying tax and the amount of revenue gained for each benefit or payment for the latest available year together with the date at which the benefit or payment first became taxable.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 5 March 1990]: I regret the delay in replying. The table lists the benefits liable to tax with the date from which they became taxable together with provisional estimates, where available, of the number of single people and married couples liable to income tax in receipt of each benefit for the whole or part of 1989-90. Table 9·6 of the 1989 edition of "United Kingdom National Accounts" (the CSO Blue Book) provides an estimate of income tax attributable in total to these benefits, applying the recipients' average rate of income tax on the whole of their income to the amount of benefit received.

Taxable Benefit	Date from which taxable	Taxpayers receiving benefit in 1989-90 (thousands)
Industrial death benefit	pre 1950	n.a.[6]
Retirement pension	pre 1950	2,750

Corporation Tax

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the corporation tax figures for each Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development country and other major economic countries; and if he will express the figures as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Lilley: Corporation tax statistics for OECD countries, including taxes on corporate income expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product, are given in "Revenue Statistics of OECD Member Countries 1964-1988", which is available in the Library. Statistics for other countries could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mortgages

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his written reply dated 20 February concerning the amount of mortgage interest payable each year since 1979 whether his figures were end-year or average, and after payment of mortgage interest relief; whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the average mortgages outstanding in each year and the amount of interest paid before relief; and if he will add an estimate for 1989.

Mr. Lilley: The figures for mortgage interest as a percentage of person disposable income and of consumers' expenditure given in reply to the hon. Member on 20 February at columns 688-89 were averages for the years and were calculated on the basis of payments gross of mortgage interest relief. As regards the amounts of interest payable before relief in these years, I would refer the hon. Member to the mortgage interest figures which were included in the reply that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave on 19 February to another question by the hon. Member at columns 524-25, which were on this basis. Estimates of average mortgages outstanding in the years 1979-1988 are as follows:

1979	42·1
1980	48·9
1981	57·5
1982	69·1
1983	84·2
1984	100·1
1985	117·7
1986	140·2
1987	168·4
1988	204·4

It is not yet possible to provide estimates of mortgage interest payable and average mortgages outstanding during 1989.

Nationalised Industries

Mr. Adley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the external financing limits for each of the nationalised industries for the last three, the current, and the next three years; and what percentage this represents, for each industry, of the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The external finance limits for nationalised industries for 1986-87 to 1992-93 are set out in table 21.5.1 of the Government's Expenditure Plans 1990-91 to 1992-93 (Cm. 1021). The public sector borrowing requirement is set out in the Financial Statement and Budget Report (HC 286).

I regret that it is not meaningful to express public expenditure provision for a particular nationalised industry as a percentage of the public sector borrowing requirement.

Independent Taxation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give figures for the total number of married couples in each income group consistent with the answer to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury on 1 March, Official Report, column 268; and if he will give figures for the proportion of each income group which will (a) gain as a result of the proposals for independent taxation and (b) receive transitional relief because of the proposals for independent taxation.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 22 March 1990]: Information is given in the table. These estimates update the figures given in reply to the previous question to allow for the levels of income tax allowances and thresholds announced in the 1990 Budget and more up-to-date information on income. The new estimates are based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are provisional.

Taxation

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish, using 1989-90 price and income levels, the effect on take-home pay of the changes in income tax and national insurance contributions since 1979 for (a) a single person, (b) a married man, and (c) a married man with two children in each case with a £30,000 mortgage at gross earnings levels of (i) £12,000, (ii) £18,000, (iii) £24,000, (iv) £30,000, (v) £36,000 and (vi) £42,000.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: The information is in the table which shows the additional liability to income tax and national insurance contributions in 1989-90 if the 1978-79 regimes had been indexed for inflation and applied to the individuals specified.

Increase in 1989-90 in income tax and national insurance contributions under 1978-79 indexed regimes

Earnings £ per annum	Single person £ per annum	Married man £ per annum
12,000	289·22	267·62
18,000	477·72	456·12
24,000	957·72	936·12
30,000	1,585·32	1,637·07
36,000	2,395·82	2,315·57
42,000	3,738·57	3,549·07

Note

Calculations assume no other source of income; no reliefs or allowances other than relief on interest at 13·9 per cent. on a £30,000 mortgage and the appropriate personal allowance; and the post-October 1989 NIC rates. Child tax allowances in 1978-79 excluded from the calculations as they were being phased out.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will construct an index with 1978-79 equalling 100 of the changes in the level of the income tax and national insurance contributions for each subsequent year for a taxpayer on (a) half, (b) two thirds, (c) average, (d) five times average and 10 times average earnings for households where the taxpayer is (i) single, (ii) married and (iii) married with two children, in each case assuming the wife does not work.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Figures for income tax and national insurance contributions for 1978-79 to 1987-88 have been placed in the Library of the House, as noted in the Official Report, 13 April 1989, col. 620. Figures for 1988-89 and 1989-90 were given in reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 8 January 1990, Official Report, columns 559-64.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish, using 1989-90 price and income levels, the effect on take-home pay of the changes in income tax and national insurance contributions since 1979 for (a) a single person, (b) a married man and (c) a married man with two children earning £6,000 per annum with no mortgage.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: If the 1978-79 income tax and national insurance regimes had been indexed for inflation and applied in 1989-90 to people earning £6,000 per annum, a single person would pay £292·82 more and a married man would pay £271·22 more. As child tax allowances were being phased out in 1978-79, they have been excluded from the comparison. The calculations assume no other forms of income and no reliefs or allowances other than the personal allowance (single or married, as appropriate), and the post-October 1989 rates of national insurance.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated yield from all sources of taxation including excise duties for 1990-91; what the comparable yield in 1978-79 was revalued at 1990-91 levels; and if he will provide a breakdown of categories used.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Total taxes on income, capital and expenditure and the community charge are forecast to yield £170·2 billion in 1990-91. The comparable figure for 1978-79 is £120·1 billion at 1990-91 prices.

Retail Prices Index

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds it was decided (a) to exclude the cost of credit and (b) to include mortgage interest in the retail prices index.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: The cost of credit has never been included in the RPI, following successive recommendations of the retail prices index advisory committee which were reaffirmed in a report submitted by the committee in 1986 (published as Cmnd. 9848).

The inclusion of mortgage interest payments in the RPI follows recommendations in a report submitted by the advisory committee in 1974 (published as Cmnd. 5905). The committee examined this question again in 1986 and confirmed that mortgage interest payments should continue to be included as a proxy for owner-occupiers' housing costs.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds it was decided (a) to exclude financial services and (b) to include property insurance in the retail prices index.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Both financial services and property insurance are covered by the retail prices index. The treatment of the former raises certain conceptual and practical problems which are currently being considered by the retail prices index advisory committee and any recommendations which the committee makes will be laid before Parliament in due course.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds it was decided (a) to include the community charge and (b) to exclude income tax from the retail prices index.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: The inclusion of the community charge follows recommendations made by the retail prices index advisory committee in a report submitted last year, which also accepted that income tax should continue to be excluded. I refer the hon. Member to that report (published as Cm. 644) which sets out the arguments very fully.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds it was decided to exclude holiday expenditure from the retail prices index.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Holiday expenditure has never been covered by the retail prices index because of difficulties in measuring price changes satisfactorily. The RPI advisory committee recommended in a report submitted in 1986 (published as Cmnd 9848) that it should be brought into the index but recognised that, before this could be done, further work would be needed to resolve some conceptual and technical problems. The Central Statistical Office is about to report back to the committee on the progress of this work and the committee's conclusions will be laid before Parliament in due course.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what grounds it was decided to exclude the price of houses from the retail prices index.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: House prices do figure in the retail prices index indirectly in that they affect the size of the morgage debt and thus the level of mortgage interest payments. In a report submitted in 1986 the RPI advisory committee considered the possibility of incorporating house prices into the index in their own right but this suggestion was rejected by the committee. I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 114 of the report (published as Cmnd 9848), which sets out the arguments very fully.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made, since the National Audit Office examination of the retail price index, with production of a technical manual incorporating detailed operational objectives for the index and with developing ways of establishing a suitable measure or measures of the statistical reliability of the index and of prioritising potential improvements to the retail prices index system.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Progress made on these matters since the National Audit Office's examination will be reported by the departmental accounting officers concerned to the Public Accounts Committee on 28 March and I would not wish to anticipate that hearing.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Brent Magistrates Court

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement about the failure of the Crown prosecution service to be represented in a magistrates court in Brent on 15 March.

The Attorney-General: I take the question to refer to the events which occurred on Saturday 17 March. I very much regret the circumstances which arose at Brent magistrates court on that day when there was no representation for the Crown prosecution service. The Director of Public Prosecutions immediately instituted a thorough investigation. An arrangement was made by a member of the CPS staff for a barrister agent to attend Brent magistrates court on that occasion. The arrangement was made in the week commencing 26 February at the same time as arrangements were made for that barrister additionally to cover courts on 3, 10 and 31 March. The barrister in question maintains that he was booked for only one date in March, that being the 31. The issue is not capable of objective resolution, but it is established that he did duly attend court both on the 3rd and the 10th.

On learning of the situation, police officers at Brent magistrates court attempted to contact the Crown prosecution service but the court dismissed the case at approximately 10.40 am. The Director of Public Prosecution has taken steps to ensure that such a situation shall not recur. A revised system has been put in place at the branch in question whereby all such arrangements are confirmed in writing and checked on the preceding afternoon, and whereby there are effective contingency procedures to deal with the situation where a prosecutor, for whatever reason, unexpectedly fails to attend. The field director for operations in the CPS has circulated every CPS area in the country requiring that all such systems be reviewed and tested.

Ashley Gardiner

Mr. Alton: To ask the Attorney-General if he will detail the procedures used by the Crown prosecution service to determine the charges brought in the case of the death of Ashley Gardiner.

The Attorney-General: The charges brought against Mark Wenham were formulated by the branch Crown prosecutor after careful consideration of a full and detailed report submitted by the Merseyside police. He preferred the charges with the full knowledge and approval of his chief Crown prosecutor. I am satisfied that, in the circumstances of this sad case, no other charge was available.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give the reasons why the Crown prosecution service did not bring a charge of causing death by reckless driving in the case of the death of Ashley Gardiner.

The Attorney-General: The facts of this sad case did not, as a matter of law, disclose the commission of an offence of causing death by reckless driving. The decision to proceed on charges of reckless driving and excess alcohol reflected the only course open to the Crown prosecution service.

ENVIRONMENT

Coastal Protection

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the sources of grant aid available from his Department for work on coastal protection and sea defences; including details of the sums of money to be paid during 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him on 7 March by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at column 712.

Advertising Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total publicity and advertising expenditure, including for privatisation, of his Department and public bodies for which his Department has responsibility in (a) 1979 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 13 March at column 191 in respect of publicity expenditure by my Department. Information on expenditure by non-departmental public bodies is published in their annual reports but is not held centrally in the form requested.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 19 March, how he calculates the figures of (a) £9 and (b) £5.

Mr. Chope: The figures are calculated by applying the appropriate monetary weights given in paragraph 3.29 of the revenue support grant distribution report (England) to the values of the specified indicators for Humberside, multiplying the result by the appropriate scaling factor for fire and expressing the result as an amount per relevant adult (rounded to the nearest £1).

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the amounts received by each district and borough in Cambridgeshire from (a) the commercial rate in 1989-90 and (b) the unified business rate in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 26 March 1990]: The amounts received from the commercial rate in 1989-90 and the unified business rate in 1990-91 are shown in the table.

Non-domestic rate yield

	1989-90 £ million
Cambridge	34·8
East Cambridgeshire	5·6
Fenland	9·8
Huntingdonshire	18·4
Peterborough	35·4
South Cambridgeshire	15·9

Business rate income (£292·51 per adult)

	1990-91 £ million
Cambridge	21·7
East Cambridgeshire	13·2
Fenland	16·5
Huntingdonshire	16·5
Peterborough	32·5
South Cambridgeshire	26·0

Note: The figures shown are not comparable due to changes in the system of local government finance, in particular changes in the way Revenue Support Grant is distributed and in the pattern of precepting by the county council.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what minimum residence period in a financial year has been established by the community charge registration officer for the payment of poll tax in each local authority for people with a residence but who normally work abroad for most of the year.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 26 March 1990]: No minimum residence period has been prescribed for the purposes of establishing whether a person is solely or mainly resident in a charging authority's area. It is for the community charge registration officer to consider each case on its merits.

South Yorkshire Fire Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 12 March, to the hon. Member for Don Valley, Official Report, column 92, what was the result of the representations made to him by the South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority in respect of its financial situation for the year 1990-91; and what conclusion was reached over the local authority grant settlement.

Mr. Chope: The representations from the South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority, together with all other representations, were considered carefully by my right hon. Friend before he finalised the details of the settlement for 1990-91. The conclusions reached are set out in the revenue support grant distribution report (England) approved by this House on 18 January.

Rateable Values (Revaluation)

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the average rateable value for (a) commercial and (b) industrial premises in each London borough following revaluation, together with the average figure for each category prior to revaluation; and what is the percentage increase as a result of the 1989 revaluation.

Mr. David Hunt: The available information has been placed in the Library. As a result of the revaluation, non-domestic rateable values in England will increase by an average 8·1 times. This was taken into account when fixing the 1990-91 rate poundage at 34·8p.

Revenue Support Grant

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the result for Humberside of applying the formulae to indicators in paragraph 3.7 (primary education), before the result is then scaled to the control total, with reference to paragraphs 3.3 and 3.7 of the revenue support grant distribution report (England).

Mr. Chope: The standard spending assessment for primary education for Humberside, before scaling to the control total, is £96,104,927.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the sum across all relevant authorities of the results of applying the formula to their indicator data for paragraph 3.7 (primary education), with reference to paragraph 3.3 and 3.7 of the revenue support grant distribution report (England).

Mr. Chope: The sum of the standard spending assessments for primary education, for all relevant authorities, before scaling to the national total is £5,091,312,178.

Disabled People (Housing)

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many disabled people were accepted by local authorities in England and Wales as priority homeless because of physical disability in each year from 1979 to 1989, respectively.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Estimates of the numbers of households accepted by English local authorities as homeless and in priority need because of physical disability are as follows:

	Number
1979	1,100
1980	1,200
1981	1,600
1982	2,000
1983	1,700
1984	2,200
1985	2,700
1986	2,900
1987	2,900
1988	3,000
1989	3,200

However, because of changes in the reporting system in 1980 and 1982, figures for the earlier years are not strictly comparable with those since 1983.

For information about Welsh authorities I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Nuclear Safety (France)

Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will meet the chief inspector for nuclear safety at Electricité de France to discuss safety at French nuclear power stations and the implications for the United Kingdom as a whole and for Kent; and if he will describe the warning and emergency procedures that would be followed in the event of a serious incident occurring at one of these power stations.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has no plans to meet the chief inspector for nuclear safety at Electricité de France. I understand that the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate has continuing contact with the French nuclear safety regulatory authority—Service Central de Sureté des Installations Nuclearies (SCSIN). Current contingency plans for overseas nuclear accidents are set out in the HMSO booklet "The National Response Plan and Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network (RIMNET). Phase 1", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Common Land

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 27 November, Official Report, column 89, to the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) when he intends to announce the Government's intentions on common land legislation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend expects to make an announcement within the next few weeks.

World Student Games

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to the 1991 world student games in Sheffield to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Moynihan: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from Monday 23 April to Friday 27 April.

Radiation Detectors

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by location (a) the chain of radiation detectors set up after the Chernobyl accident and (b) those that are still operative.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The location of the monitoring stations in the national radiation monitoring network, RIMNET, are listed in the HMSO booklet "The National Response Plan and Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network (RIMNET). Phase 1", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. They are all operating.

Housing Corporations

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why the Housing Corporation is delaying cash allocations in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope: The Housing Corporation is currently discussing draft allocations with housing associations. I understand that the corporation expects to make a formal statement of allocations at about the end of April and subsequently to set cash planning targets for associations.

Bathing Water

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce a system to alert members of the public to the failed status of a beach in respect of bathing water standards.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is for local authorities to issue advice in respect of bathing water quality. We are considering with the National Rivers Authority and the Department of Health whether it would be appropriate to give guidance to local authorities.

Environment

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council on 22 March.

Mr. Chris Patten: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting.

Agreement was reached, subject to final confirmation by the Federal Republic of Germany, on a directive on the freedom of access to environmental information. This is a principle which has been consistently promoted by the United Kingdom, and which is strongly reflected in the Environmental Protection Bill currently before Parliament. I was therefore particularly pleased that agreement was reached on a measure which has great significance for public accountability and for the environment across Europe. The directive requires member states to provide the public with access to environmental information held by all public authorities with environmental responsibilities, while setting out certain categories of information whose confidentiality may be protected where necessary. It also provides for the dissemination to the public of general information on the environment.

The Council concluded agreement on two directives on the contained use and the deliberate release of genetically modified micro-organisms. These directives establish a Communitywide system for regulating operations involving genetic modification. They are broadly compatible with United Kingdom legislation relating to human health and safety, and with proposals in part VI of the Environmental Protection Bill. They are also in line with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution in its 13th report. The system established under these directives will secure a high level of environmental protection, while providing stable arrangements for the development of the biotechnology industry in the United Kingdom and in Europe as a whole.

Agreement was also concluded on a regulation establishing a European Environment Agency responsible for the collection, co-ordination and analysis of environmental information. The Council considered and agreed amendments submitted by the European Commission reflecting opinions expressed by the European Parliament. In particular, it was agreed that the work programme of the agency would be reviewed after two years of operation. The location of the headquarters of the agency will be decided separately.

A useful discussion took place on the development of a Community policy on global climate change. Ministers considered an informal Commission paper on this subject, but there was widespread recognition that further work was urgently needed. I was able to make a number of specific suggestions for positive action by the Community which would assist reductions in carbon dioxide emissions. The Commission was invited by the presidency to undertake further consideration of these issues.

The Council heard a progress report from the Commission on negotiations towards the revision of the Montreal protocol on substances which deplete the ozone layer. I urged the Commission to maintain the Community's case for the fastest possible phase-out of CFCs, and to consider further improvements to the Community's position on other ozone-depleting chemicals.

I warmly welcomed a draft Council resolution setting out a strategy and principles for the Community's policy on waste. The resolution, which was adopted, includes commitments to waste minimisation and recycling, together with the aim of self-sufficiency of member states in waste disposal. It will provide the framework within which a number of new directives on waste will be brought forward in the near future.

I also welcomed the Commission's recent proposals for a consolidated directive on car emissions, which received a generally favourable reaction in a first exchange of views.

Ministers again reviewed progress on a draft directive concerning water pollution by nitrate from diffuse sources, which was remitted for further discussion. A proposal to establish a committee to review and amend technical details of certain existing directives on water quality was also discussed and received United Kingdom support.

I took the opportunity to urge the Commission to bring forward new proposals containing tough controls of emissions from lorry and other diesel engines in line with the United States 1994 standard, the strictest in any current legislation. In addition, I asked the Commission to come forward quickly with proposals on the incineration of toxic and dangerous wastes which will ensure that the highest standards of design and operation, reflecting state of the art technology, are applied throughout the Community.

Sewage Sludge

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has made an assessment of the levels of (a) metals and (b) harmful micro-organisms present in unpasteurised sewage sludge used as fertiliser; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 23 March 1990]: The levels of metals in sewage sludge vary depending upon local circumstances. When sludge is used in agriculture, producers must ensure that the metal concentrations in the soil resulting from use of sludge do not exceed the limits specified in the Sludge (Use in Agriculture) Regulations 1989 (SI No. 1263). Detailed records have to be maintained by the sludge producer and made available to Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, which is responsible for enforcement of the regulations. The regulations also require that sludge is treated before use to reduce its fermentability and content of pathogenic organisms. Advice on acceptable sludge treatment methods is contained in the code of practice for agricultural use of sewage sludge published by the Department in 1989.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of sewage sludge is pasteurised before final disposal; what action he is taking to increase this percentage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 23 March 1990]: Apart from one small pilot installation in Yorkshire, there are no operational sludge pasteurisation plants in the United Kingdom. This process is not used to any great extent elsewhere in other countries and we have no plans to require more extensive use here.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to extract plastic waste from sewage sludge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 23 March 1990]: It is a condition of licences for the disposal of sewage sludge at sea that non-degradable materials such as plastics must be removed before disposal. Enforcement is a matter for the licensing authorities.

The code of practice for agricultural use of sewage sludge also recommends that non-degradable material should be removed from sludge before spreading on the land. Sludge producers find it essential in any event to screen out such materials to ensure efficient operation of sludge stabilisation processes.

Tyres

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what official guidance exists for those seeking to dispose of redundant tyres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 23 March 1990]: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs is expecting to receive very shortly a report from KPMG Peat Marwick identifying ways of reducing the volume of scrapped vehicle tyres and increasing resource recovery. When he receives the report, a working party will be set up with industry, local authority and voluntary group representation, to draw up an action plan. The plan will cover what guidance is necessary for those seeking to dispose of redundant tyres.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his reply of 12 March, if he will list the site of the 40 display signs purchased and erected by the Leeds development corporation, the cost of each sign and the details of competitive tendering in relation to the erection of each sign.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 26 March 1990]: A single contract for making and erecting all the signs was let by competition to the cheapest tenderer. The costs for individual signs are not therefore available.

I will write to the hon. Member with the details of the location of all the signs currently in place.

Local Government Finance (Rebates)

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much it would cost to give full exemption to all non-employed status YTS trainees with special training needs endorsements from paying the community charge.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will estimate the cost of exempting all non-employed status YTS trainees with special training needs endorsements from paying the rebated poll tax.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 26 March 1990]: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 19 March 1990, at column 482.

Riverside Works, Chartham

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received against application CA 897798/CHA for gravel extraction at the water meadow site next to Riverside at Chartham; and if he has any plans to call in the application.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Seven representations have been received by my Department. Kent county council granted planning permission for this application on 13 March 1990. Call-in, therefore, is not now an option open to the Secretary of State.

Pesticides

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the amount of pesticides which enter rivers each year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Surveys were undertaken in 1989 to identify the concentrations in rivers of their pesticides included on the red list of substances most dangerous to water. Results of the surveys are expected shortly. Further monitoring for these substances will be undertaken this year as part of a Paris Commission comprehensive survey of riverine inputs, in which all signatories of the Paris convention are participating.

ENERGY

Electricity Prices

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the average rise in the price of electricity between February 1974 and June 1979; what were the price increases since June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: From the first quarter of 1974 to the second quarter of 1979, domestic electricity prices increased by 171 per cent., and industrial prices by 131 per cent. The average annual increase over this period was therefore 21 per cent. for domestic customers and 17 per cent., for industrial customers. The equivalent average annual increases since the second quarter of 1979 have been 8 per cent. for domestic customers (for the period up to the fourth quarter 1989) and 7 per cent. for industrial customers (for the period up to the third quarter of 1989).

European Commissioner (Meeting)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library a copy of the minutes of his meeting of 12 March with the European Commissioner responsible for competition.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) on Monday 26 March at column 5.

Coal Mines

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) how many licensed underground coal mines not owned and operated by British Coal are working by county (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland; (2) what is the average size, in terms of coal output and manpower, of licensed underground coal mines working by county (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland.

Mr. Baldry: These are matters for the British Coal Corporation as the licensing authority.

Coal Imports

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the annual tonnages by port of coal imported from non-United Kingdom sources in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990 (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland.

Mr. Baldry: The latest available information on coal imports is as follows:

Low-sulphur Coal

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of accessible reserves of low-sulphur coal in (a) England, (b) Wales, and (c) Scotland; and if he will list by name the (i) deep mines and (ii) opencast mines which have access to these reserves.

Mr. Baldry: Estimates of coal reserves, and their recoverability, are the responsibility of the British Coal Corporation. The Department does not make such estimates.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is, by analysis, the current definition of low-sulphur coal of the sort to be burnt as an alternative to the retro-fitting of desulphurisation technology at United Kingdom power stations.

Mr. Baldry: The Government are determined to implement in full the EC large combustion plants directive. This directive commits the United Kingdom to reduce its emissions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxides from existing plants, such as fossil fuelled power stations, but does not specify the means by which this has to be done. Decisions by the electricity generators to retrofit flue gas desulphurisation equipment to some power stations will play an important part. However, the burning of coal with a lower sulphur content than the average for that mined in the United Kingdom is also likely to contribute towards meeting this directive. The origin and composition of the coal to be used would be a matter for the generators to determine. Greater use of natural gas will also have a role to play.

Coal Mines (Employment Numbers)

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy why the upper limit on numbers of men employed in non-British Coal deep mines is 150.

Mr. Baldry: The new 150 manpower limit on men who may be employed to work underground in licensed deep mines will enable greater investment to be made in modern mining equipment and techniques, and should lead to improved productivity and safety. The new limit is well below the manpower levels of British Coal's smallest pits and has been carefully chosen to fill a gap in the exploitation and development of reserves of coal, particularly coals in short supply, that can be economically and safely worked by private mines on this new scale.

Nuclear Electric plc

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his written answer of 6 March, Official Report, column 566, whether he now proposes to give to Nuclear Electric plc the letter of comfort in respect of its liabilities as described in the departmental minute laid before the House on that date.

Mr. Wakeham: A departmental minute was laid before the House on 6 March, describing the nature of the assurance I intend to provide to Nuclear Electric plc. That minute has now been before the House for more than the required period of 14 sitting days. I have considered all the representations made. I remain satisfied that I should give assurance to Nuclear Electric plc in respect of the types of liability outlined in the minute. I will be writing today to the company to provide this assurance. As the departmental minute makes clear, the extent of the commitment entered into by giving such an assurance is constrained by the statutory limit of £1 billion set out in schedule 12 to the Electricity Act 1889. Commitment beyond this limit will be possible only with the approval of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Stationery

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make available House of Commons headed stationery, compliments slips, etc. for hon. Members' use, printed bilingually in Welsh and English.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There has so far been no significant demand for this, but if hon. Members wish to have a service of this kind I will investigate what can be done.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Zimbabwe

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the level of assistance to Zimbabwe.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to him on 24 July 1989 column 454 and 4 December 1989, column 9, to which I have nothing further to add.

Cambodia

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make public the findings of the diplomatic mission which visited Cambodia in late 1989.

Mrs. Chalker: The main conclusions of the British mission to Cambodia last December have been passed on to interested non-governmental organisations in Britain. The report itself is an internal working document. I announced on 8 January column 702 the approach that we shall be taking to assistance for Cambodians as a result of the mission.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will propose to his European Community colleagues the establishment of an European Economic Community assessment mission to be sent to Cambodia.

Mrs. Chalker: EC Commissioner Matutes made a visit to the region in January. An EC Indo-China refugee co-ordinator will be appointed to monitor the situation and EC involvement throughout the region. The EC also plans to increase its humanitarian assistance programmes for Cambodians, channelling funds through non-governmental organisations.

European Investment Bank

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total debt owed by developing countries to the European investment bank; whether any debt has so far been written-off; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: At the end of 1989, the total debt owed to the European investment bank by developing countries in the Mediterranean region was 998 million ecu, around £730 million; and that owed by African, Caribbean and Pacific countries was 630 million ecu, around £460 million. None of this debt, which arises from loans from the bank's own resources, has been written off.

European Development Fund

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total debt owed by developing countries to the European development fund of the European Community; whether any debt has so far been written off; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that the European authorities do not keep readily available information on current levels of outstanding European development fund debt. The Council of Ministers has not taken any decisions to write off such debt.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC Synergy Agreement

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the data bases and other sources of information held by the Government which will be covered by the European Community synergy agreement; and what steps are being taken to harmonise and publicise the conditions for access;

(2) if he will make it his policy to comply with clause 19 of the synergy agreement to ensure that any pre-existing citizens' rights of access to the original information as determined by legislation are preserved; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what guidelines he has compiled defining the conditions for the release and exploitation of public sector data and information, under the European Community synergy agreement; and how he proposes to publicise these;

(4) which public departments and bodies in the United Kingdom are included in the 1989 European Community's agreement on guidelines for improving the synergy between public and private sectors in the information market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: Tradeable information guidelines were issued in 1986 by my Department for use by all Government Departments and these apply to all Government-held information in electronic form. The guidelines are fully consistent with the European Commission's "Guidelines for improving the synergy between the private and public sectors in the information market", published in 1989, and do not affect Departments' statutory obligations.

The tradeable information guidelines are made available to the private sector by my Department and are also publicised by the Confederation of Information Communication Industries.

Company Accounts

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the checks which Companies house staff perform upon receipt of the annual company accounts.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the written reply I gave to his similar question on 14 March at column 304.

Audit Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the auditing standards and guidelines to which his representative on the Auditing Practices Committee has (a) objected and (b) assented.

Mr. Redwood: The Department's representative does not have a vote. He naturally discusses a wide range of matters, presenting the Department's viewpoint on the normal terms of committee confidence.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether auditors are under any statutory duty to search for and evaluate evidence relating to the applicability of the going concern concept.

Mr. Redwood: The duties of auditors under the Companies Act are set out in sections 236 and 237 of the Companies Act 1985. It is a basic accounting principle (set out in paragraph 10 of schedule 4 to the Act) that there is a presumption that a reporting company is carrying on business as a going concern. If the accounts are drawn up on that basis but the auditor finds that the audit evidence does not justify that presumption he should report appropriately.

Property Reforms, USSR

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his assessment of the impact of the recent reforms of property rights in the Soviet Union on joint ventures between firms in the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Redwood: The new law on property ownership in the Soviet Union, which is due to come into force on 1 July, opens up the possibility of foreign ownership of Soviet enterprises, either independently or through joint ventures. This will, however, be subject to further legislation, currently in draft and not expected to be published before next year, which will consolidate and revise the law on the general status of foreign ownership in the Soviet Union.

In principle, this will help British companies to invest in the Soviet Union, by putting such investments into a proper legal framework. Business will also need to weigh other risk factors, including hard currency, which will still make it difficult to repatriate profits earned in the Soviet market.

GATT

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the High Commissioners of Canada, New Zealand and Australia to discuss the progress of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations in Geneva, with particular reference to agricultural trade; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Ministers and officials in my Department have had a number of recent discussions about the GATT negotiations with representatives of Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and the high commissioners or members of their staff have been present at several of these. The discussions have included agricultural trade.

Consolidated Sterling Deposits

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what investigations are currently taking place on the activities of Consolidated Sterling Deposits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Consolidated sterling deposits is based in the United States of America and appears to be outside the scope of my Department's investigatory powers. My Department understands that there have been investments in this fund through the medium of Hamilton House Associates Limited, a United Kingdom investment company which was suspended by Fimbra in January 1990.

European Space Agency

Mr. Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what stance the Government are adopting towards the new telecommunications programme of the European Space Agency.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom informed the council of the ESA on 21 March that it would be participating in the agency's proposed satellite communications programme. This would involve a commitment of £32 million over the coming years. Some of the other member states of ESA have still to announce their level of participation. But the programme is expected to commence shortly.

Innovation Advisory Board

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will publish the first report of his Department's Innovation Advisory Board.

Mr. Ridley: In its first 15 months the Innovation Advisory Board has focused on particular issues concerning the United Kindom's performance on innovation. Its work on two of these topics, "Innovation and Growth", and "Innovation: City Attitudes and Practices", will be published for a conference on innovation and short-termism planned for 25 June this year.

Companies Act (Disclosure Provisions)

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will bring into force the provisions of the Companies Act 1989 on the disclosure of interests in shares.

Mr. Redwood: On Friday 23 March I signed an order to commence subsections (1), (2), (3), (5) and (6) of section 134 of the Companies Act 1989. These provisions will come into effect on 31 May 1990. From that date, the notifiable percentage for disclosure of interests in shares of public companies under part VI of the Companies Act 1985 will be lowered from 5 per cent. to 3 per cent. and the period allowed for disclosure will be reduced from five to two business days. The order also states that, where an existing interest of between 3 per cent. and 5 per cent. becomes notifiable by virtue of the coming into force of section 134(2), the person holding the interest comes under an obligation to disclose when he is or becomes aware that he has such an interest, and he must notify the company within the new period for disclosure, that is, two business days.

No regulations under subsection (5) and (6) are being made at the present time.

I have placed a copy of the order in the Library.

Used Postage Stamps

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will institute an inquiry into the fraudulent treatment and resale of used postage stamps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 26 March 1990]: This is an operational matter for the Post Office which keeps such issues under constant review. I refer the honourable and learned Member to the written reply I gave in the House on 13 March to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley).

Rover Sale

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received full payment from British Aerospace for the purchase of Rover.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: The consideration for the Government shareholding in the Rover Group has not yet been received from British Aerospace. I expect it to be paid on 30 March 1990.

Coto Doñana National Park, Spain

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, of 5 March, Official Report, column 407, what information he has on the level of United Kingdom investment in the Coto Doñana tourist development and associated projects.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 16 March 1990]: I understand that there are some unconfirmed reports of United Kingdom investment in the Costa Doñana tourist development and associated projects. However, I have no official information, nor do I have any details to connect to the unconfirmed reports.

Export Representative Service

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the rate of usage by businesses of the export representative service in the case of (a) the United States of America, (b) Canada and (c) West Germany for each month from September 1988 to date.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 21 March 1990]: Usage by businesses of the export representative service has been:

	United States of America	Canada	West Germany
September 1988	1	—	3
October 1988	1	—	3
November 1988	—	—	—
December 1988	—	—	—
January 1989	—	—	4
February 1989	1	—	3
March 1989	4	1	8
April 1989	1	1	3
May 1989	1	—	1
June 1989	2	2	1
July 1989	5	1	6
August 1989	6	—	7
September 1989	6	2	4
October 1989	4	1	8
November 1989	1	2	4
December 1989	9	—	—
January 1990	10	1	7
February 1990	8	—	7

In addition a further 16 reports were commissioned for West Germany and a further three for Canada in the period September 1988 to June 1989, but cannot be attributed to a particular month.

Business Inquiries

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many major inquiries were made by business under the overseas status report service for each month from September 1988 to date;

(2) how many substantive inquiries were made by business under the overseas status report service for each month from September 1988 to date.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 21 March 1990]: The information that is readily available is as follows:

Reports paid for in the period September 1988 to March 1989

	Reports
September 1988	36
October 1988	63
November 1988	64
December 1988	70
January 1989	50
February 1989	53
March 1989	107

Following the introduction of the service card system of payment in 1989 it has not been possible to record the monthly use of this service. Use is estimated by quarters as follows:

	Reports
April to June 1989	80
July to September 1989	73
October to December 1989	66
January to March (to date) 1990	62

A breakdown of reports taking up to four hours and those taking more than four hours could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Press Secretary

Q67. Mr. Tam Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if it was with her authority that her press secretary on 12 March initiated a call to the Press Association to comment on the alleged challenge on her position as Prime Minister from members of her own party; if she will put in the Library a transcript of the conversation between Mr. Ingham and the representative of the Press Association; and what consequences such an initiative has for relations between the civil service and the press as outlined in the Armstrong guidelines.

The Prime Minister: My chief press secretary, as a civil servant, acted wholly properly in correcting, on my behalf, an unfounded newspaper allegation relating to the Government.

Leith

Q144. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Leith.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Local Government Finance

Q168. Mr. Latham: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement on the outcome of the fixing of community charge levels in England; and what information she has on how many county councils have been able to fix precepts in accordance with the Government's published target figures.

The Prime Minister: The average community charge for England is estimated to be £363, an increase of 33 per cent. over this year's average domestic rate income per adult, and £85 more than the community charge for standard spending.

An increase of this size means increases in demands and precepts of more than 16 per cent. This cannot be justified on any terms. It is almost twice the level of inflation and £3 billion above the amount the Government believed it would be reasonable to spend to achieve a standard level of service.

The level of the charges in shire county areas are very largely determined by the precepts set by the counties. It is extremely disappointing that on average they have seen fit to increase these by more than 7 per cent. above their standard spending assessments (SSA) or by nearly £50 per adult. Labour-controlled county councils' precepts are on average £82 per adult above their SSAs.

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report the text of her letters to the hon. Member for Brent, East on 23 June 1988, 31 August 1988, 29 September 1988 and 13 February 1989, about Mr. Colin Wallace and related matters.

The Prime Minister: It is not my practice to do so.

Local Authorities

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will set out the evidence on which she based her statements concerning overspending by Labour-controlled local authorities, made on 20 March, Official Report, column 1007.

The Prime Minister: On the basis of the information then available to the Department of the Environment, Labour authorities' budgets were on average 14 per cent. above their standard spending assessments; the budgets of Conservative-controlled authorities were estimated to be on average 4 per cent. above their SSAs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has said that he intends to place a summary of the returns for individual authorities in the Library of the House after returns from all authorities have been received.

Baltic States (Gold Reserves)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government will replace or deposit with the Bank of England to the order of the independent Governments of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania the national gold reserves of those countries which were deposited for safe-keeping in the Bank of England before Russia occupied the said countries and which, pursuant to the Foreign Compensation Act 1969, were subsequently converted to other uses without their depositors' assent.

The Prime Minister: If claims were presented to Her Majesty's Government by Governments of future independent Baltic states, such claims would be considered.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government will request the Russian Government to return to the Bank of England, for redeposit to the order of the Governments of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania, the national gold reserves of those countries which had been deposited with the Bank of England for safe-keeping prior to the Russian occupation of those independent countries.

The Prime Minister: The Soviet Government do not possess the gold reserves of the former Baltic states. The action taken by the British Government in 1968 in respect of these reserves is set out in the answer which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on 5 March.

Engagements

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 27 March.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 27 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pesticides

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research is being undertaken or financed by his Department into the costs, crop yields and incomes of farmers who minimise use of fertilisers, pesticides and antibiotics.

Mr. Curry: Over £18·5 million will be spent by this Department in 1989-90 on research concerned with pesticides and alternative methods of pest control to which it attaches high priority and from which the farming industry will benefit. A list of the projects being funded was given to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) on 1 December 1989, column 471-80.

In particular, the Department has funded research at Boxworth experimental husbandry farm into the impact of reduced pesticide usage on the farming environment and on crop yields and margins. Plans are advanced to extend this work to cover reduced fertiliser inputs as well. A copy of the final report of the Boxworth project will be lodged in the Library of the House when completed and published later this year. Antibiotic use is controlled by product licence under the Medicines Act 1968. The Department is actively funding research projects aimed at developing alternative methods of disease prevention.

The Department has also commissioned, in consultation with the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and the Welsh Office and with the assistance of the various organic farming associations, a study of the economics of the production and marketing of organically grown farm produce in Great Britain. The study is being conducted by the university of Cambridge in co-operation with the University college of Wales, Aberystwyth, and the North of Scotland college of agriculture. A full report is expected to be published in the spring of 1991.

WALES

Infertility

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the infertility services provided by each health authority in Wales.

Mr. Grist: This information is not collected centrally.

Community Health Councils

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total annual cost of community health councils.

Mr. Grist: The total health funding for community health councils in Wales in 1989-90 amounts to £666,086.

Southern Wales Coalfield

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if measures are to be taken to prevent the further despoilation of the remaining areas of hillside, woodlands and crags which lie between heavily urbanised valleys of the southern Welsh coalfield.

Mr. Grist: Sufficient powers are available to local planning authorities to control development in the open countryside.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what funds are to be made available to local authorities, Welsh Water plc and the Welsh division of the National Rivers Authority to clean up the material pollution and debris in and alongside the rivers of the southern Welsh coalfield.

Mr. Grist: It is for the National Rivers Authority (NRA) and the local authorities concerned to determine their own expenditure priorities. The NRA has stated as its central aim the achievement of a significant and sustainable improvement of the water quality of the rivers, estuaries and coastal waters of England and Wales and it has been allocated substantial funds for this work. Provision has also been made for local government's environmental protection responsibilities in the 1990-91 local authority revenue settlement and this has been reflected in standard spending assessments for revenue support grant purposes.

With regard to Welsh Water, sewage-related material is only part of the litter problem, but Welsh Water is committed to an investment programme on an unprecedented scale which includes improvements to a large number of its sewage treatment works. This will make a major contribution to improving the quality of our rivers including those in the south Wales coalfield.

The NRA has conducted a survey of litter in and on the banks of the River Taff. In its conclusions the report said that because of the diversity of the litter tackling the problem requires the collaboration of all the responsible bodies including the local authorities and voluntary organisations. Disscussions are proceeding with the intention of taking forward the initiative.

Disabled People (Employment)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of disabled people employed by (a) his Department, (b) the Welsh Development Agency, (c) the Development Board for Rural Wales, (d) Wales Tourist Board and (e) Tai Cymru and, for each, the number employed (i) in total and as a percentage of all employees, (ii) by grade and as a percentage of all employees in that grade and (iii) by the severity of their disability.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Department employs 27 people who have notified me that they are registered disabled. They make up 1·2 per cent. of the total work force. In addition, four disabled people are employed under the sheltered placement scheme.

Grade	No. of Registered Disabled People	Per cent of Grade
6	2	3·0
SPTO	1	2·7
HEO	2	1·0
EO	5	1·4
AO	7	1·7
AA	3	1·0
Typist	1	0·8
Support Grades	5	4·5
Industrial	1	0·9

Staff who are registered disabled are not classified in terms of the severity of their disablement.

The information requested relating to the non-departmental public bodies listed is not held centrally and the hon. Gentleman should approach the organisation direct.

Health Authorities (Finance)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what provision is built into his allocation of finance to health authorities in Wales for 1990-91 to allow for inflation.

Mr. Grist: The allocations to health authorities in Wales for 1990-91 which my right hon. Friend announced on 11 January take account of the 5 per cent. forecast of general inflation which was given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Autumn Statement. However, it is for each authority to make its own assessment of the prospective effect of pay and price rises on its own mix of staff and non-staff expenditure in the light of this forecast when planning its budget. This process will be assisted by the recent determination of pay increases for staff covered by the review bodies' arrangements as announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 1 February and by the additional £11 million provision which is being made available to authorities in Wales in recognition of the excess costs of these awards over the provision for forecast general inflation within authorities' original allocations for 1990-91.

Industrial Sites (Sale)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will direct the Welsh Development Agency to offer sitting tenants in their factories first refusal when industrial estates are being offered for sale;

(2) if he will issue guidelines to the Welsh Development Agency regarding consultation with its tenants of industrial units when those units are being offered for sale;

(3) if he will direct the Welsh Development Agency to offer first refusal to the relevant local authority when its industrial estates are being offered for sale.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidance he has given the Welsh Development Agency on the sale of industrial sites to sitting tenants.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Welsh Development Agency's policy for the disposal of individual sites and units is established on the basis of guidelines issued by the Department. These state that the agency shall at all times seek to obtain the best possible consideration and whenever reasonably practicable to seek competitive bids for the asset, whether land or buildings. Whenever it is practical to do so, the agency considers the possibility of sales to industrial tenants.

National Parks

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures are being taken to limit the physical damage to vulnerable natural landscapes in the National Park areas of the Brecon Beacons, Snowdonia, Pembrokeshire and Gower.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The relevant national parks authorities have the general responsibility for identifying and taking steps to limit physical damage to vulnerable landscapes in those areas for which they are responsible, in accordance with their statutory powers and wider management interest.

All three parks are preparing maps and related management strategies for these areas as required under section 3 of the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Act 1985. Within these areas the national parks have additional powers to make management agreements with landowners where developments threaten landscape quality. In addition, all parks have consultation procedures to protect against inappropriate forestry development and management programmes to repair damage caused by recreational pressures. They also seek to influence farmers, landowners and the general public by education and persuasion. As planning authorities the national parks also control development. Where appropriate, national parks have acquired land which they manage directly to ensure the maintenance of quality.

The Countryside Commission has also recently established a review panel under the chairmanship of Professor Ron Edwards, which will address the issue of vulnerable landscapes, among other matters. It is expected to report early in the new year.

National Assistance Act 1948

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many inquiries have been undertaken under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 in each of the past 10 years; what was the average length of time taken; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many requests to conduct an inquiry under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 he has received in each of the last 10 years; what action was taken in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: In the last 10 years a large number of requests has been received for inquiries into matters concerning local social services authorities. One inquiry under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 was held. It took place over a two-month period in 1988. It was decided not to declare the authority in default as the authority took steps to deal with the cause of complaints.

X-ray Treatment (Myodil)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice his Department has given to health authorities in Wales on the use of myodil; when this most recent advice was given; and on what dates advice was previously given on the use of myodil prior to x-ray treatment.

Mr. Grist: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

UNESCO

76. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which activities of UNESCO British scientists still participate; and what funding he provides to support these activities.

Mr. Sainsbury: British scientists play an active role in a number of UNESCO projects. In particular they are involved with the intergovernmental oceanographic organisation, of which we remain a member; the international hydrological programme; man and the biosphere programme; and the international geological correlation programme.

Financial support from ODA available to these projects from the money saved by our withdrawal from UNESCO totalled £296,000 in 1988-89. United Kingdom scientific consultants have also been involved in a number of UNESCO programmes.

South Georgia

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has concerning the threat to wildlife on South Georgia, especially penguins and seals, resulting from the depletion of stocks of krill and ice fish following intensive fishing by Soviet and east European fishing fleets; and if he will extend the present 12-mile limit to 200 miles.

Mr. Sainsbury: We are concerned that the present level of fishing activity round South Georgia is threatening the conservation of fish stocks. We are also concerned about the possible consequences of this for wildlife in the area, particularly the wandering albatross.

We are tackling these problems through the multilateral convention for the conservation of antarctic marine living resources (CCAMLR), in which we play a leading role.

The commissioner for South Georgia commissioned a research cruise in January 1989 and another in January this year, and we are in touch with the Soviet authorities at both diplomatic and scientific levels.

We have no plans at present to impose a 200-mile exclusive economic zone unilaterally round South Georgia.

Embassy Staff

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current totals of staff employed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics embassy in London and the United Kingdom embassy in Moscow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Soviet staff currently employed at the embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in London—77.

British staff currently employed at the British embassy in Moscow—78.

Cuba

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's current relations with Cuba.

Mr. Sainsbury: We have normal relations with Cuba.

Information Research Department

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), to the hon. Member for Brent, East on 3 May 1988 about the Information Research Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. A copy of the letter was placed in the Library of the House, as indicated in the answer given to the hon. Member on 23 May 1988 by my hon. Friend the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Vol. 134, c. 26.

European Single Market

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are proposing to the European Commission for the study of the effect of 1992 on developing countries and of measures to limit any damaging effects.

Mr. Maude: We believe that the single market process will bring significant gains not just to the European Community, but to the entire international trading system, including the developing world. To this end we have consistently pressed for greater openness in trade to ensure that full benefits are achieved. We recently commissioned a study by the Overseas Development Institute, which confirmed that the single market should have a limited positive impact on developing countries, with particular opportunities for trade.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the effects of 1992 on developing countries.

Mr. Maude: The single market will bring significant gains to the international trading system and in particular should be of overall net benefit to developing countries. We have stressed the widespread advantages in discussing 1992 with Members of this House, members of the public, and with representatives of other Governments.

Israel

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations between Britain and Israel.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have nothing to add to the reply given to my hon. Friend on 7 February by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Vol. 166, col. 688.

Baltic States

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government are making to the Government of the Soviet Union regarding the recent declaration of independence by the Republic of Lithuania.

Mr. Sainsbury: In our recent contacts with the Soviet authorities we have stressed the importance of continued dialogue between Moscow and the Lithuanian people. We have made clear our view that all involved should exercise the maximum restraint.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what requests have been made by the Governments of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia for assistance in exercising their self-determination in terms of political education and financial assistance.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office gave to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 19 March, Vol. 169, col. 447-48. We have not received requests of the sort described from Baltic groups.

HEALTH

Simplesse

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a further statement about (a) the product Simplesse and (b) its possible nutritional implications.

Mr. Freeman: Simplesse is a microparticulated egg and milk protein product which is intended to replace fat in the diet in uncooked food such as mayonnaise and frozen desserts. The Food and Drug Administration in the USA has recently affirmed as "generally recognised as safe" a microparticulated protein product (Simplesse) for use in frozen desserts (pp 6383-6391 of the "Federal Register" of Friday 23 February).

Since the main use of Simplesse is likely to be in high-value specialist products its effect on the fat intake of the population as a whole is unlikely to be very significant. However, for some population groups—for example, children consuming large quantities of ice cream—it may affect fat intake.

Although the possible nutritional implications of the use of this product will become clear only when data on intakes become available, the Department of Health is considering the available information on the likely nutritional effects of Simplesse.

In addition, the Food Advisory Committee will be considering fat replacers as a general issue in the near future.

AIDS

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if any current study commissioned by his Department into the survival of viruses in sea water includes the AIDS virus.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has not commissioned any studies into the survival of HIV or other viruses in sea water.

Disability

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations his Department has received concerning full implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 20 March at columns 563-65.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations his Department has received concerning the need for a statutory duty for local authorities to consult disabled people and their carers on their community care plans.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received representations from several groups about the need for local authorities to consult on their community care plans. The White Paper "Caring for People" makes it clear that we expect local authorities to consult and take account of the views of service users and carers in drawing up these plans.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps his Department is taking to examine the adequacy of the law relating to guardianship, mental incapacity, and abuse of mentally handicapped adults;

(2) whether his Department has any evidence concerning the abuse of mentally handicapped adults in the community and in institutions;

(3) whether his Department has carried out consultations concerning the need to amend existing legislation to enable guardianship to be used to protect people with a mental handicap;

(4) whether his Department has received any representations concerning the need to amend existing legislation to enable guardianship to be used to protect people with a mental handicap.

Mr. Freeman: We have received representations from hon. Members, SENSE and members of the public and the report on the extent of abuse from Dr. Leila Cooke.

We will consider the need for future statutory provision in the light of the outcome of the review the Law Commission is currently undertaking of the law relating to mentally incapacitated adults and will consult widely on any proposals.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to increase representation and advocacy opportunities for people with mental handicap; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Planning guidelines issued to health authorities in health circular (88)43, a copy of which is in the Library, state that every district should consult mentally handicapped people and their families, as well as the statutory and other agencies concerned, in preparing policy statements and action plans for meeting the health needs of mentally handicapped people. The Department has also grant-aided National Citizen Advocacy by £15,000 a year in 1987-88 and 1988-89 and by £20,000 in 1989-90 towards the cost of its national resource centre and advisory service for locally based advocacy projects.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has commissioned any independent research into the abuse of mentally handicapped adults in the community and in institutions.

Mr. Freeman: The Department is not currently carrying out any research into the abuse of mentally handicapped people.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has issued any guidance to professionals working with mentally handicapped people regarding training and effective procedures for dealing with suspected abuse.

Mr. Freeman: No specific guidance has been issued. We would expect the local statutory bodies as part of their general responsibility for the provision of mental handicap services to ensure that professionals are aware of the procedures for dealing with cases of suspected abuse in their area.

Community Care

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will detail the timetable proposed and the consultation procedure to be undertaken for each of his Department's project groups on aspects of implementation of the community care proposals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department intends to issue drafts of guidance by the end of May with the aim of producing guidance in final form by the end of September. We shall seek views from representative bodies and other organisations involved in implementing the proposals of the White Paper "Caring for People".

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which voluntary organisations he will consult on the draft guidance drawn up by his Department on the Government's community care proposals.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department will consult formally the main "umbrella" associations representing voluntary organisations. Within this process all voluntary organisations are welcome to make their comments.

Wythenshawe Hospital, Manchester

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from Dr. P. V. Barber of Wythenshawe hospital, Manchester, and fellow consultants at the hospital in regard to rationalisation and the deferment of decisions; what reply he is sending to their letter of 15 March; if there is any action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have replied to the letter of 15 March from Dr. P. V. Barber and other doctors at Wythenshawe hospital, south Manchester, in which they express concern about the delay in reaching a decision on proposals for rationalising district hospital services currently provided at the Wythenshawe and Withington hospitals. Responsibility for establishing how south Manchester's health needs are to be met in the future is a matter to be decided by that district health authority in conjunction with the North Western regional health authority and taking account of the record level of resources for 1990-91 made available to them by the Government and recently announced. We have no reason to interfere in the local decision-making process, which must clearly take account of the views expressed by all interested parties, including medical opinion at Wythenshawe and Withington hospitals.

Communication Disorders

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children and adults have (a) cerebral palsy and (b) other speech/language/communication disorders; and how many of these people have received speech therapy in the past or are currently receiving it.

Mr. Freeman: Information about the number of children and adults with cerebral palsy is not available centrally. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) on 26 March for estimates of the numbers of people with speech and language disorders. Not all those with speech and language disorders necessarily need or would benefit from speech therapy, and it is not known how many of them have received speech therapy in the past. Estimates of the number of people receiving speech therapy in England in 1988-89 are not yet available.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money his Department has spent on research during the most recent five years for which figures are available; how much money his Department has spent on research into disorders of human communication and appropriate service provision to deal with such disorders during these five years; and if he will provide details on each research project undertaken into this subject during the most recent year for which this information is available.

Mr. Freeman: Expenditure on research and development work in the field of health and personal social services commissioned over the last five years is as follows:

	£ million
1985	11·2
1986	11·5
1987	12·6
1988	12·9
1989	[1]15·3

[1] Approx.

In 1989 approximately £434,000 was spent on research into speech therapy, visual and hearing impairments. Figures for the preceding four years are not readily available. Details of the research programme are published in the Department of Health yearbook of research and development and for earlier years in the annual DHSS handbooks of research and development, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide information relating to the demand for and take-up of devices for assisting communication, such as speech synthesisers and portable communication aids, and if he will provide specific figures, where possible, for particular devices.

Mr. Freeman: Information is not available in the form requested. A 1984 research report "Communication Aids Provision", commissioned by the Department from the rheumatology and research unit of the university of Leeds indicated that 1,214 communication aids had been prescribed to adults by 82 per cent. of speech therapy departments in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to investigate the need for alternative communication systems for the communication-handicapped population.

Mr. Freeman: Officials at the Department of Health, together with officials from the Department of Education and Science, have been examining whether the current arrangements for the assessment of children who require aids to communication meet the needs of those children in the most efficient and cost-effective way. We will consider in the light of their work whether any specific steps by the two Departments will be appropriate.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department is considering making it possible for communication-impaired people of all ages to have access to appropriate communication aids.

Mr. Freeman: It is for individual authorities and their professional staff to determine whether a communication aid is appropriate for a communication impaired person. Health authorities can seek advice from the specialist communication aids centres to enable them to make a judgment.

Health Service Staff

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many physiotherapists, occupational therapists, clinical psychologists and pharmacists are employed in each district in England.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total staff pay bills were for speech therapy, physiopherapy, occupational therapy, clinical psychology and pharmacy for 1986-87, 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90; and if he will provide the latest figures on staff pay bills for speech therapy in each district in England.

Mr. Freeman: The information derivable from annual accounts submitted to the Department for the financial years 1986-87 to 1988-89, the latest available, has been placed in the Library. Equivalent information for 1989-90 will become available in the autumn.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much speech therapists' pay increased in real terms in the years 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1989-90; and how much the pay of physiotherapists, pharmacists, general practitioners, hospital doctors and nurses increased in real terms over the same periods.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The real-terms increases are as follows:

Financial year	Speech therapists	Physiotherapists	Pharmacists	General Practitioners	Hospital doctors	Nurses
1986-87	2·91	5·05	[1]10·10	4·47	4·47	4·66
1987-88	[2]4·61	4·70	0·77	2·69	3·89	5·09
1988-89	1·54	4·72	[4]4·67	3·27	4·04	13·47
1989-90	[3]0·93	−0·28	n/a	0·19	0·19	−1·11
1986-87 to 1989-90[5]	13·57	18·22	n/a	16·44	14·25	27·03

[1] Six per cent. average increases w.e.f. 1 April 1986; from 1 October 1986 Emergency Duty Services remuneration scheme introduced, plus a further increase of £800 on all pay points for basic grade staff.

[2] Settlement introduced revised grading definition £450 lump sum.

[3] Eighteen month settlement w.e.f. 1 April 1989.

[4] Settlement consisted of 3·1 per cent. increase w.e.f. 1 December 1987 plus assimilation to new salary scales w.e.f. 1 April 1988.

[5] Percentage real terms increase reflects cummulative percentage settlements deflated by the percentage change in the retail prices index from April of the base year to April of the latest year.

National Assistance Act 1948

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, on 13 March, Official Report, column 182, how many requests to conduct an inquiry under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 he has received in each of the last 10 years; what action was taken in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not available. Where representations are made to the Department which state or imply that a local authority has failed to comply with its statutory duties under welfare legislation, whether or not section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948 is specifically referred to, appropriate inquiries are made. Since 1 January 1990, seven such representations have been received, each in respect of services for disabled people. Inquiries are continuing in these and some earlier cases; many have been resolved, either by a decision that there was no breach of statutory duty or by compliance on the part of the authority.

TRANSPORT

Trains (Passenger Limits)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has for putting statutory passenger load limits on trains; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend has no such proposals. He has agreed with BR load factor standards for Network SouthEast and provincial services. The Government are supporting a large rail investment programme which is giving priority to new higher capacity rolling stock to help in achieving those standards.

Footpaths and Bridleways

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989, the number of temporary traffic regulation orders made by local authorities under section 14 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to restrict or prohibit the use of footpaths or bridleways for which he gave consent under section 15(2) of that Act for an extension of the period for which the order was in force.

Mr. Atkins: Temporary traffic orders affecting footpaths and bridleways are not separately identified from those affecting road traffic. Records are not kept centrally, and the information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Roll On/Roll Off Ferries

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what action he proposes to take to assess whether existing roll on/roll off ferry ships and new designs remain unacceptably vulnerable;

(2) when he expects to report on the findings of the Government's research programme on roll on/roll off ferry design and vulnerability.

Mr. McLoughlin: Following the official report of the formal investigation into the loss of the Herald of Free Enterprise, the Department of Transport initiated a wide-ranging programme of research into ways of increasing the safety of ro-ro passenger ferries. The steering committee which supervised the programme has now completed its work, and I am studying its report and recommendations. I hope to make the report and the results of the research widely available shortly.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents there have been and how many casualties have been sustained in incidents involving roll on/roll off ferries at sea in each of the past 10 years for which records are available.

Mr. McLoughlin: The numbers of accidents involving United Kingdom passenger roll on/roll off ferries for which records are readily available, together with the numbers of lives lost, are:

Year	Accidents	Lives Lost
1982	3	6
1983	2	—
1984	—	—

Year	Accidents	Lives Lost
1985	1	—
1986	—	—
1987	4	189
1988	1	—

Coal Importing Facilities

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current rated capacity in tonnes per hour of imported coal handling facilities on a port-by port basis (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department does not have this information.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many applications have been received, by county, to expand or significantly alter existing coal importing facilities at ports (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland;

(2) how many new applications have been received, by county, to develop and operate coal importing facilities at ports (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland.

Mr. McLoughlin: Since 1985 no port developments have needed the Secretary of State's approval. Port undertakings are generally free to develop whatever facilities they wish on existing port land. Port developments elsewhere need either planning permission or statutory powers by means of an order under the Harbours Act or a private Bill. I am not aware of any recent applications for statutory powers for port developments for the express purpose of importing coal.

A1, Barnet

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish statistics for personal injury connected with use of the gap in the central reservation of the A1 Barnet way, opposite Hyver hill, for the years 1987, 1988 and 1989; what evidence he is considering in reaching his decision on whether to close the gap; what recommendations he has received from the London borough of Barnet in connection with proposals to close the gap; and whether they have conveyed to him the views of local residents about the effects of any closure.

Mr. Atkins: No personal injury accidents were recorded at this gap for the years in question. The closure of the gap, in association with other works planned for the Barnet way, was proposed in consultation with the London borough of Barnet, as the Department's agent for this part of the A1 trunk road, and was not opposed by the council's public works committee. The evidence being considered includes representations from or on behalf of seven residents of Hyver hill opposing closure, and the Department's own knowledge of and maintenance plans for the road. The leader of the council wrote to me about the effect of the proposed closure on local residents.

Underground Train Drivers

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will instruct the railway inspectorate to examine the period of experience required before a driver may take sole charge of an underground train; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Drivers of London underground trains are presently recruited from guards who are trained to drive as part of their duty, and who can apply to become drivers after six months' service. Candidates for driver posts receive a further 14 days of basic training, followed by a period of rolling stock and route training specific to the line on which they are to drive.

As the number of guards is declining, London Underground has developed proposals to recruit drivers directly. This is at present being discussed with the unions concerned and I have asked the railway inspectorate to review the conclusions of those discussions with London Underground in due course.

St. John's Wood Underground Station

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ask for a report from the chairman of London Underground on the safety aspects of the renewed removal from service of an escalator at St. John's Wood underground station.

Mr. Portillo: Although closure of an escalator is inconvenient to passengers, the alternative facilities are not unsafe.

Rail Accidents

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) passengers and (b) British Rail staff died as a result of accidents involving passenger trains in each of the years from 1980 to 1989, inclusive.

Mr. Portillo: The table shows fatalities in accidents involving all trains. I am unable to specify those attributable solely to passenger trains. Similarly, the staff figures include all railway employees; no separate figures are available for BR staff fatalities.

	Passengers	[1]Staff	Total
1980	25	24	49
1981	35	22	57
1982	18	25	43

[2] Provisional figures.

Road Accidents

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people died as a result of road accidents in each of the years from 1980-89 inclusive.

Mr. Atkins: The information is as follows:

Persons killed in road accidents: Great Britain, 1980-89

	Deaths
1980	6,010
1981	5,846
1982	5,934

[1] Provisional.

The 7 per cent. decline in road deaths between the 1981-85 average and 1989 has achieved a level which represents one of the lowest in Europe. Nevertheless, we have set ourselves the target of reducing the toll by one third by the year 2000.

Iron Foundries (Rail Equipment)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his actions in relation to the Office of Fair Trading, Rail Equipment Investment, the Atlas steel foundry in Armadale and William Cook plc in the light of the debate on 23 March.

Mr. Portillo: I understand that the Director General of Fair Trading is considering, in the normal way, what advice he should give in this case. The action to be taken in the light of that advice will be a matter for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The procurement of equipment for British Rail is a matter for the board, which requires that it be obtained from an approved foundry, whether in this country or elsewhere.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Ardglass Harbour

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when capital funds will be released for the construction of the new harbour at Ardglass in South Down; and if he will give a commencement date for the scheme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Gentleman's question on this issue on 1 February 1990, Official Report, column 341.

Stevens Inquiry

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when it is anticipated Mr. John Stevens will report the results of his investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: I understand that Deputy Chief Constable Stevens is expected to report the findings of his inquiry to the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary some time during the month of April.

Education Reform Brochures

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the level of resources expended on the brochure, "Education Reform —What it Means to You".

Dr. Mawhinney: It is important that the Northern Ireland public should be properly informed about the most radical changes to education in the Province for almost 50 years. I am satisfied that the level of expenditure involved was the minimum consistent with achieving this objective.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total cost incurred in the preparation and design of the brochure entitled, "Education Reforms —What it Means to You"; and which office was responsible for having this work carried out.

Dr. Mawhinney: This work—at a total cost of £32,386 —was carried out on behalf of the Department of Education by McCann-Erickson (Belfast) Ltd.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total cost of the (a) manufacture/printing, (b) distribution and (c) advertisement of the brochure entitled, "Education Reform—What it Means to You".

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Manufacture/printing	158,535
(b) Distribution	89,600
(c) Advertisement	252,523

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which firm printed the brochure entitled, "Education Reform—What it Means to You".

Dr. Mawhinney: The brochure was printed by Reproprint Limited, Burnley.

Pin-ups

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will issue instructions for the removal of all offensive pin-ups in all departmental premises.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 5 March 1990]: The Northern Ireland civil service issued instructions to staff on 12 October 1988. It is the duty of line managers in the Northern Ireland civil service to ensure that any material of a sexual or divisive nature (including posters, flags, insignia and other articles) which is potentially offensive or may cause apprehension is not displayed or circulated in the workplace. A similar line is taken in the home civil service group of the Northern Ireland Office.

Marine Research

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table to show how much of (a) the staff and (b) the finances made available to the newly formed merger of fisheries research laboratory staff will be dedicated to (i) the research vessel Lough Foyle, (ii) marine fish stock assessment, (iii) other marine research, (iv) research on the river Bush and (v) other fresh water research.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Information in the form requested is not available. The areas identified are continuing to receive attention as previously, with intensification of effort planned for marine science and fish stock assessment being met with additional resources.

The balance of future effort in each area will reflect perceived priorities of the policy/scientific needs of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the daily running costs of the research vessel Lough Foyle when it is in berth at Belfast.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The marginal cost of the vessel in port is estimated at £600 per day.

Fisheries Research Laboratory

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what have been the annual running costs of the fisheries research laboratory in Coleraine in each of the last two years broken down into (a) salaries, (b) equipment, (c) overheads and (d) total.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The information is as follows:

Costs[1] of DANI Fisheries Research Laboratory, Coleraine, (£000):

	1988-89	1989-90
Salaries:	179	218
Equipment:	19	63
Consumables:	30	32
Travel:	15	12
Overheads:	36	49
Total	279	374

[1] Excluding expenditure on marine research vessel.

Freshwater Biological Unit

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, what have been the annual running costs of the freshwater biological unit at Antrim for each of the last two years broken down into (a) salaries, (b) equipment, (c) overheads and (d) total costs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The information is as follows:

Costs of DANI Freshwater Biological Investigation Unit (£000):

	1988-89	1989-90
Salaries:	189	211
Equipment:	28	36
Consumables:	43	45
Travel:	4	6
Overheads:	40	45
Total	304	343

Salmon

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has, or is collected by the Fisheries Conservancy Board, in respect of catches of salmon and grilse by anglers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 March 1990]: None.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to introduce the community charge in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The Green Paper of January 1986 "Paying for Local Government", which formed the basis for the Great Britain reforms, made it clear that the proposals did not apply to Northern Ireland. This reflected the fact that local government arrangements in Northern Ireland are significantly different from those in the rest of the United Kingdom and we have no present plans to replace the existing system.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he has taken to ensure that the local government finance system in Northern Ireland is fair and accountable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 20 March 1990]: Since 1973 the provision of local authority-type services in Northern Ireland has been on a very different basis from the rest of the United Kingdom. Ninety per cent. of the expenditure on these services is administered by Northern Ireland departments as a fully integral part of the public expenditure survey systems and as such is subject to the full scrutiny of Parliament. The remaining 10 per cent. is administered by the district councils. In those circumstances, Northern Ireland has not experienced the problem of accountability which has been a key issue in the Government's approach to the reform of local authority finance in Great Britain.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any plans for a revaluation of property for domestic rating purposes in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 20 March 1990]: The case for both commercial and domestic revaluation of property in Northern Ireland is kept under review. Any plans would, as in the past, be announced well in advance.

Terrorism

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many terrorist killings of United Kingdom citizens have occurred in the Irish Republic between 1972 and 15 November 1985; and if anyone has been made amenable to the courts for these murders.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: The information is not currently available in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many terrorist killings of United Kingdom citizens have occurred in the Irish Republic since 15 November 1985; and if anyone has been made amenable to the courts for these murders.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: The information is not currently available in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will continue to press the authorities in the Irish Republic concerning terrorist murders within its jurisdiction of citizens of the United Kingdom; when he last made representations on this issue; and what response he has had.

Mr. Cope: This subject has been raised on a number of occasions and latterly at the intergovernmental conference in February 1989 following the death of Mr. Keys. In all our discussions on security co-operation the desirability of bringing the perpetrators of all terrorist murders to justice is foremost in our minds.

Electoral Register

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many police officers in the Royal Ulster Constabulary are unable to register to vote because of the likelihood of the Provisional IRA using the information contained in the electoral register as a source of information in order to target them.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990): I have no reason to believe that members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary are deliberately not registering as electors.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will consider introducing a special confidential register of electors for the Royal Ulster Constabulary through which secure postal voting arrangements could be implemented; and for inclusion in which the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary would vouch his officers to the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: The introduction of a special confidential register of electors would present practical difficulties and there are no plans to introduce a separate register of this kind. But, as I explained in my reply to a recent question from the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), Official Report, 26 February 1990, column 37, we continue to keep the matter under careful review.

Security Forces (Home Security)

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) whether he will consider making available to all members of the security forces living in Northern Ireland the opportunity to have installed basic home security measures;

(2) whether, in the light of the circumstances surrounding the terrorist killing of Royal Ulster Constabulary Inspector Derek Monteith in Armagh, there has been a review of the level of threat at which home security measures become available to members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary; and if the criteria have changed.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: The personal safety of members of the security forces living at home in Northern Ireland is kept under constant review by the appropriate service authorities. It would not be appropriate for me to indicate publicly what measures have been or may be taken.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, in his consultations with the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, he is regularly briefed on the various sources of threat to members of the police force in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: Yes.

SCOTLAND

Infertility

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the infertility services provided by each health board;

(2) what is the prevalence of infertility in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have nothing to add to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Holborn and St Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 28 July 1989, Vol. 157, column 969-70.

Education Spending

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those years in the period 1974 to 1989 when financial cuts in real terms were made in public expenditure on Scottish education.

Mr. Lang: The years in the period 1974-75 to 1988-89 where the rate of increase in education expenditure was less than the rate of increase in the GDP deflator are as follows:

1975-76
1976-77
1977-78
1979-80
1982-83
1983-84
1985-86

Airflow Beds

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many airflow beds are in use in Scottish hospitals; what was the position in 1980, 1985 and 1988; and what are the reasons for their purchase and use.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information about the number of airflow beds in use is not held centrally. Such beds are used where clinically indicated.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present pupil-teacher ratio in (a) primary and (b) post-primary schools in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The pupil-teacher ratios in education authority schools in September 1988 were 20·3 in primary schools and 12·7 in secondary schools; the provisional September 1989 figures are 19·7 in primary and 12·4 in secondary.

Hospitals and Community Health Services

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the proposed distribution of the hospital and community health service capital for 1990-91.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has allocated £130·593 million to health boards to meet their gross capital expenditure commitments on hospital and community health services in 1990-91. This will enable the substantial investment in hospital building projects in recent years to continue.

Substantial investment will be made in major hospital projects now under construction, including the Ayr acute hospital in Ayrshire and Arran, the St. John's hospital in Lothian, the Royal Cornhill hospital in Grampian, the Perth royal infirmary in Tayside and the Stornoway hospital in the Western Isles. It will also provide the resources for construction to start on new hospital developments, including the hospitals at Oban and Campbeltown, the West Fife district general hospital phase II and the spinal injuries unit at the Southern general hospital, Glasgow.

The allocations to individual health boards are as follows:

Health Boards	Capital allocation (£,000)
Argyll and Clyde	5,000
Ayrshire and Arran	22,000
Borders	1,400
Dumfries and Galloway	1,500
Fife	6,300
Forth Valley	5,730
Grampian	11,250
Greater Glasgow	23,850
Highland	3,800
Lanarkshire	11,195
Lothian	17,500
Orkney	358
Shetland	1,455
Tayside	10,905
Western Isles	8,350
Total	130,593

Pittenweem Harbour

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet representatives of Fife regional council to discuss the project for the redevelopment of Pittenweem harbour.

Mr. Lang: Not at the present. My officials and those of Fife regional council have still to reconcile their assessments of costs and benefits in establishing whether this project meets the necessary criterion of adequate return on investment. In addition there are still parliamentary procedures to clear before proceeding further.

Speech Therapy

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what qualifications a teacher is required to hold over and above the basic teaching certificate in order to specialise in work with children with specific language disorder.

Mr. Lang: There is no statutory requirement for teachers to hold a qualification over and above the basic teaching certificate to specialise in work with children with specific language disorder. However, teachers employed wholly or mainly in special classes for pupils suffering from speech defects are normally required to hold a teacher's certificate (primary education) with a special qualification to act as a teacher of physically handicapped children, or an appropriate teacher's certificate (secondary education).

Electricity

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what efficiency factors he intends to set in the licences to be issued to the Scottish electricity industry.

Mr. Rifkind: As indicated in my reply of 22 March 1990, Official Report, column 705, the maximum average distribution, supply and transmission prices to be charged by Scottish Power plc and Hydro-Electric plc will be capped and indexed by an RPI-X formula. I have now decided that the values of X will be as follows:

	Scottish Power	Hydro-Electric
Transmission	1·0	0·5
Distribution and Supply	0·5	0·3

These values allow for capital expenditure on the system significantly in excess of historic levels so that the present high security standards are maintained. They also assume the achievement of increased cost efficiency within these businesses as private sector disciplines are introduced.

Taken together with my decision that the generation element within the overall price charged to Scottish consumers should not be allowed to increase by more than RPI over the next four years, this means that average price increases after vesting to all consumers taking less than 10 MW will be held below the rate of inflation at least until April 1994. Larger customers will benefit from the downward competitive pressure on prices under the new industry structure.

Secondary Education

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to review courses and examinations in the fifth and sixth years of Scottish secondary education.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received advice from the Scottish Examination Board that the current structure of examination for pupils in the fifth and sixth years of secondary education may no longer be adequate, and that a detailed study of arrangements after standard grade should be undertaken. I have considered the board's advice and have decided to establish a committee to review the position and to report to me by the end of 1991.

The remit of the committee will be:

> to review the aims and purposes of courses and of assessment and certification in the fifth and sixth years of secondary school education in Scotland;
>
> to consider what structure of courses and what forms of assessment best satisfy these aims and purposes taking account of the needs of pupils of varying ability and background, the demands of employment and the requirements of and developments in higher and further education;
> to recommend necessary changes.

I am glad to say that Professor John Howie, Regius Professor of Mathematics at the university of St. Andrews, has accepted my invitation to chair the committee. A further announcement about its membership will be made shortly.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of occasions on which poll tax registration officers have had to alter their registers within the last year; and what was his initial estimate of the number of changes likely to be required.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 21 March 1990]: It is the responsibility of community charges registration officers to compile and maintain the community charges register and the information requested is not held centrally.

City Technology Academy

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much private capital has been promised for a city technology academy; from whom it is to come; and under what conditions.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Trusthouse Forte has already announced its decision to sponsor a technology academy in Scotland and has made a firm and generous offer of £1·5 million towards its cost. I fully expect that more will be raised when a decision has been taken on the location of the academy.

Regional Councils

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland by how much regional councils exceeded Government expenditure guidelines in each of the years since 1979-80.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 26 March 1990]: The information requested is set out in the following table:

1979-80	197·6
1980-81	388·5
1981-82	273·1
1982-83	102·6
1983-84	10·5
1984-85	101·1
1985-86	63·2
1986-87	151·8
1987-88	81·3
1988-89	98·7

Expenditure guidelines have not been issued by my right hon. and learned Friend for the years subsequent to 1988-89.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons engaged in Government-funded or partially funded training schemes are classified as (a) employed and (b) unemployed.

Mr. Nicholls: There were approximately 595,000 participants on Government schemes in Great Britain in January 1990, the latest date for which information is available. The schemes included are YTS, employment training and community industry.

All these participants are classified as part of the work force in employment except for a small number on YTS whose training does not include work experience with an employer.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on how the official unemployment count is made.

Mr. Nicholls: The unemployment count is based upon the administrative system for paying unemployment related benefits, that is, unemployment benefit, income support and national insurance credits. It relates to people claiming these benefits who say that on the day of the count they were unemployed and capable of, available for and actively seeking employment. (Students claiming benefit during a vacation and who intend to return to full-time education are excluded.)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of (a) all mothers with children 16 years or under, (b) mothers with children 16 years and under without working husbands, (c) single-parent men with children 16 years or under and (d) single-parent women with children 16 years or under who are (i) in full-time employment and (ii) in part-time employment.

Mr. Nicholls: Preliminary estimates from the 1989 labour force survey are shown in the table:

Great Britain, spring 1989

Parents with children under 16 years	Percentage in employment[1] Full time[2]	Part time[2]	All[3]
(a) All mothers	19	37	55
(b) Mothers without working husbands	[4]—	[4]—	24
(c) Single-parent men	57	5	64
(d) Single-parent women	17	21	38

Source: Preliminary 1989 Labour Force Survey estimates.

[1] Includes employees, the elf-employed and participants in work-related government training programmes.

[2] The full-time/part-time classification is based on respondents' self-assessment.

[3] Includes those in employment who did not specify whether in full-time or part-time work.

[4] Estimate not readily available.

Benefits

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the benefits which a person loses upon entering a Government-sponsored training programme.

Mr. Nicholls: A trainee on YTS or ET would normally stop receiving unemployment benefit, dependency benefit, sickness benefit, invalidity benefit or severe disablement allowance while in training. Other social security benefits will usually continue in payment depending upon the individual's circumstances.

Unemployment

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide an estimate of the total cost of unemployment to the Exchequer, including benefits, redundancy fund payments, administration costs, lost revenue, and so on.

Mr. Eggar: The estimated expenditure in 1988-89 on unemployment and supplementary benefit paid to the unemployed is £5,390 million; redundancy fund payments totalled £7 million and the administration costs of paying benefits to the unemployed were £332 million.

Workfare

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether an analysis of workfare has been made by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My Department financed a study of workfare which was initiated and commissioned by the employment research centre of the university of Buckingham. A report of the study was published in 1987 under the title "Would Workfare Work?". Since the study was undertaken, the Government have introduced a number of measures; most recently in the Social Security Act 1989, to require unemployed people to seek work actively as a condition of receiving unemployment benefits.

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report a table providing information about the increase in weekly and hourly earnings for full-time male and female manuals and non-manuals in (i) manufacturing, (ii) the public sector and (iii) the whole economy, less the production industries and the public sector; and what numbers are represented by each category in each class.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates of the increases in average gross weekly and hourly earnings in the year to April 1989 (the latest available) are provided in the following table. The categories "manufacturing" and "public sector" are not mutually exclusive groupings and the data for them are thus not directly comparable. Similarly, because the categories "production industries" and "public sector" are not mutually exclusive, comparable figures for the whole economy excluding them are not readily available and would involve disproportionate cost to compile.

Estimates of the numbers in employment are not available for the categories requested except for manual/non-manual employees in employment in manufacturing; the latest available estimates, for September 1989, are published in table 1.10 of the December 1989 Employment Gazette.

Percentage increase in weekly and hourly earnings of full-time adult employees in the year to April 1989[1]

	Weekly earnings			Hourly earnings
	Males	Females	All	Males	Females	All
Manuals and non-manuals
(i) Manufacturing	9·2	10·3	9·2	8·8	10·4	9·0
(ii) Public sector	8·3	12·0	9·1	9·1	13·2	10·2

Labour Force Survey

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give from Labour force survey evidence by region, including Greater London, and for Great Britain, by male, female, full and part-time, and 1980 SIC division the number of self-employed people in June of 1979, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates from labour force surveys as requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give, from the 1989 labour force survey by region, including Greater London and by male and female, the number of people not counted as unemployed by the definition using ILO/OECD guidelines on the grounds that they had not looked for work in the four weeks prior to interview, but who stated that they would like a job if one was available, and were not free to start work within two weeks;

(2) if he will give, from the 1989 labour force survey by region, including Greater London and by male and female, the number of people not counted as unemployed by the definition using ILO/OECD guidelines on the grounds that they had not looked for a job in the four weeks prior to interview, but who stated that they would like a job if one was available, and were available to start work within two weeks.

Mr. Nicholls: Preliminary results from the 1989 labour force survey, as requested, are shown in the following table:

Persons not in employment and not unemployed on ILO definition who had not looked for work in four weeks prior to interview[1] but would like a job, by availability to start work

Students

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average length of unemployment for each student who was registered unemployed during the summer of 1989 in each region of the country.

Mr. Nicholls: The information is not available.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total value of unemployment benefit paid to students during the summer vacation of 1989 in each region of the country.

Mr. Eggar: This information is not available.

Pits (Safety Disputes)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many safety disputes have occurred at pits during the last 48 months.

Mr. Nicholls: Estimates for the past four years of the number of stoppages and working days lost in the coal industry over safety issues are detailed in the table below:

Year	Stoppages	Working days lost
1986	15	2,419
1987	12	5,855
1988	5	3,442

National Speak Week

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, if he will ensure that (a) all jobcentres include in the staff training programmes and (b) all those involved in employment training programmes are given a showing of the National Speak Week video "Show You Care".

Mr. Eggar: I should like to thank the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) for drawing the video to my attention. My officials are arranging to see it. A decision on how far it should be disseminated to employment service personnel and to those involved in delivering the employment training programme, and if so through what means, will be taken when they have done so.

Skill Centres

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many civil servants were involved in the management buy-out team in the Skills Training Agency; whether time, during working hours, was provided to draw up their proposals; and over how many months preparation work had been undertaken to form the proposal from Astra Training Services Ltd.

Mr. Eggar: Three civil servants formed the management buy-out team in the skills training agency. No other staff were involved in the planning or preparation of the buy-out proposals.

Given their special position as a management buy-out team, in early April 1989 my Department removed the three officers concerned from direct responsibility for decisions affecting both personnel matters and the expenditure of public money. This was done to ensure that bias could not enter into decisions.

The majority of the time spent on the preparation of the management buy-out proposals was beyond normal hours of duty though departmental management agreed to provide time during working hours on the understanding that the buy-out team's official duties were always accorded priority. Detailed planning by the management buy-out team started after my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) announced on 13 March 1989 the intention to move STA into the private sector. I understand that a small amount of preliminary work, purely on a contingency basis, took place before that announcement and that the team were in contact with professional advisers as from the autumn of 1988. This was not done at the expense of the team members' official duties.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the powers under which civil servants were permitted to form and operate a private limited company; and which provide the authority for the sale of 47 skill centres to Astra Training Services Ltd.

Mr. Eggar: No powers are needed for civil servants to form and operate a private limited company. Such activity must not have an adverse effect on their official work or bring any conflict of loyalty to their position as civil servants.

The Secretary of State maintained skill centres under section 2 of the Employment and Training Act 1973 which empowers him to make such arrangements as he considers appropriate for the purpose of assisting persons to train for employment. No specific powers are required to discontinue arangements which he no longer considers appropriate. In the case of the skills training agency, the Government believe that a successful move to the private sector will provide a more effective contribution to the national training effort.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Bradford, South of Tuesday, 20 March, what is the price which has been negotiated for the sale of 10 skill centre sites; how many other sites are under consideration for sale; and who are the purchasers of the 10 so far arranged.

Mr. Eggar: As indicated in the earlier reply, Official Report, 20 March 1990, column 577, I propose to sell the Government's interests in the 10 skill centre sites where a training business purchaser is to be granted a lease, later this year. I propose to sell the Government's interest at nine further sites currently held by units of the Skills Training Agency which are not included in the terms of sale agreed with purchasers of training businesses. None of these 19 property interests has yet been offered for sale, so it is too early to say what price will be negotiated or who the purchasers will be.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what expenses have been charged by Deloitte Corporation Finance and Deloitte Haskins and Sells in connection with their work on the sale of the 47 skill centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Total expenses in connection with the sale of the skills training agency in 1989-90, including professional fees and expenses paid to Deloittes and other advisers, will be available in the Appropriation Accounts (class VI, vote 5) to be published in the summer.

Restart

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people (a) were referred to each menu option at the restart interview, (b) failed to attend for interview and (c) were referred to the unemployment benefit office from their interview and for what reasons, for the quarters ended September 1989 and December 1989.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is provided in the table:

	Quarter ending September 1989	Quarter ending December 1989
Referred to:
Job	68,900	64,100
Jobclub	46,200	45,200
EAS	18,200	15,500
Restart course	15,800	16,600
Employment training	88,900	77,800
Other referrals[1]	58,800	48,200
Referred to the unemployment benefit office
For failure to attend an interview	81,600	62,500
Non-availability/refusal of employment/actively seeking[2]	14,700	12,000

[1] Referrals to claimant advisers, disablement resettlement officers.

[2] Actively seeking statistics have been collected since October 1989 only.

Accidents (Coal Mines)

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many employees were killed in 1987, 1988, 1989, and 1990 in accidents (a) in opencast coal mines operated directly on behalf of British Coal and (b) in licensed opencast coal mines; and how many men, in total, were employed in those divisions of mining during those years;

(2) what was the rate of reportable accidents per man shift worked (a) in opencast coal mines operated directly on behalf of British Coal and (b) in licensed opencast coal mines, for each year 1987 to 1990.

Mr. Nicholls: At opencast coal sites operated by the British Coal opencast executive one fatal accident occurred in 1987-88 and one in 1988-89. There were no fatal accidents at licensed opencast sites during this period. Figures for 1989-90 are not available.

The Health and Safety Executive keeps records of the number of accidents at opencast coal sites but not of the numbers of persons employed at such sites.

It is not possible to calculate accident rates as information regarding the number of man shifts worked is not available.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the rate of reportable accidents per man shift worked (a) in British Coal deep mines and (b) in licensed underground coal mines in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Nicholls: Accident statistics are recorded by fiscal year and those for 1989-90 are not available. Statistics for 1987-88 and 1988-89 are as follows:

(a) in British Coal deep mines the rate of reportable injuries per 100,000 manshifts worked was 38·62 in 1987-88 and 32·25 in 1988-89.

(b) it is not possible to calculate the rate of reportable injuries at licensed underground coal mines as manshift figures are not available.

Mines (Inspections)

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many licensed mines were visited by Her Majesty's mines inspectors in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990, by county (a) in England, (b) in Wales and (c) in Scotland.

Mr. Nicholls: The information can be supplied in the form requested only at disproportionate cost.

Training and Enterprise Council (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what resources will be available to the training and enterprise council in Bradford; what level of support has been secured from the private sector; what level of grant he is making; how many training places will be available through the training and enterprise council in Bradford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The amount of development funding which will be made available to the Bradford and district training and enterprise council (TEC) is currently being finalised.

I have been very encouraged by the high level of support and commitment from the private sector in establishing the Bradford and district TEC. Its corporate and business plan will set out their proposals to develop training and enterprise activities in the area.

Work Permits (Dependent Territories)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether a decision has yet been made on a special annual quota for the current year of work permits for workers from the dependent territories whose level of skill is below that required by the general work permit scheme.

Mr. Eggar: The arrangements for a special annual quota are kept under review. I can confirm, however, that it has been decided that there should be a quota for 1990 of 200—the same as last year. Within that figure of 200 no more than 150 permits will be allowed for any one territory.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if, on the basis of data in the 1987 family expenditure survey, he will list the cash and percentage changes in real equivalised incomes of each decile group of pensioner households for each year since 1979;

(2) if he will give the overall increase in pensioner incomes in real terms by quintile group for each year from 1979-80 to 1986-87;

(3) what proportion of all pensioners have no income from any source other than from state benefits.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available information shows that in 1987, 15·9 per cent. of pensioner tax units received all their income from state benefits. This compares favourably with the figures for 1979 when 22·5 per cent. of pensioner tax units received all their income from the state benefits.

The information requested on

1. the overall increase in pensioner incomes by quintile group; and
2. the cash and percentage changes in real equivalised incomes of each decile group of pensioner households;

Note: In common with all other surveys, the Family Expenditure Survey draws information from a random sample of the population. This means that the FES will occasionally include some individuals whose weekly incomes are considerably higher or lower than those of the remainder of their quantile. The unrepresentative income of such individuals may cause wide swings in the figures particularly in year-to-year comparisons and when dis-aggregated into quantiles. In general, when viewed over the long term, the data provides a reliable indication of the movement in average weekly income.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the proportion of (a) all pensioners, (b) single male pensioners, (c) single female pensioners, (d) pensioner couples, (e) single women aged 75 years or over, (f) single men aged 75 years or over, (g) couples where at least one partner is aged 75 years or over, who are in receipt of an occupational pension on the basis of the 1987 family expenditure survey; and for each group what is the mean and median amount received.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is set out in the table.

Table: Pensioners with occupational pensions

Housing Benefit

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will consider taking steps to deal with the failure of local authorities to meet housing benefit claims within the statutory periods.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We have no power to intervene in the day-to-day administration of the housing benefit scheme, which is the statutory responsibility of the local authorities. Authorities were, however, recently reminded about their duty to process claims within 14 days, or as soon as reasonably practicable thereafter, in a circular HB/CCB(90)1, a copy of which is in the Library.

Independent Living Fund

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for financial assistance were made to the independent living fu[illegible]uring 1988 and 1989 from people living in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: The information requested is not available for Wales only. The independent living fund is currently helping 202 people in Wales and has helped 215 people in Wales since July 1989.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are (a) the estimated expenditure targets and (b) the projected Government grants awarded to the independent living fund for (i) 1990 and (ii) 1991.

Mr. Scott: The independent living fund's budget was doubled to more than £10 million in 1989-90 and has been doubled again to well over £20 million in 1990-91. Estimated expenditure targets are not available for 1990-91.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any plans to reduce the resources of the independent living fund during the next financial year.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to reduce the resources of the independent living fund in 1990-91. Indeed we have more than doubled its resources to well over £20 million in 1990-91.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disabled people have been helped by the independent living fund since its inception; and if he will categorise them according to the nature of their disability.

Mr. Scott: The independent living fund has helped 4,264 disabled people up to the end of February 1990. Sufficient information is not available in order for them to be categorised by the nature of their disability.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money has been awarded in grants by the independent living fund since its inception; if he will categorise them according to the purpose for which they have been made; and what proportion is in the form of (a) single grants and (b) regular payments.

Mr. Scott: The independent living fund had awarded a total of £8·3 million in benefit up to the end of February 1990. Information detailing the specific purpose for which payments have been made is not available.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will ensure that the independent living fund has sufficient resources to continue to provide for those urgent needs of disabled people which are not met by social security provision, the local authorities or the Health Service;

(2) if he will ensure that the independent living fund has sufficient resources to ensure that the regular payments it makes to disabled people can continue as long as the need remains;

(3) if he will ensure that the independent living fund has sufficient resources to ensure consistency in its awards to disabled people throughout its financial year;

(4) if he will make a statement on the funding and future of the independent living fund.

Mr. Scott: Provision for the independent living fund was doubled to more than £10 million this year and doubled again to well over £20 million for 1990-91. However, the success of the fund means that much of this provision is committed to existing beneficiaries or to those to whom offers of help have already been made.

We intend to meet the trustees of the fund shortly to discuss how best to proceed in these changed circumstances.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list in the Official Report the main objectives of the independent living fund.

Mr. Scott: The aim of the independent living fund is to provide, subject to the provisions and powers laid down in the trust deed, financial assistance to very severely disabled people who are in need of such assistance to enable them to live independently.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will request the independent living fund to monitor the claims it receives so as to assess the variation in local authority response to requests for help with the needs of disabled people; and if he will provide them with the funds to do so.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to make such a request to the independent living fund.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has received from the trustees of the independent living fund regarding the funds they require for 1990-91 to continue to respond to requests for help from disabled people in a way that is consistent with their established practice.

Mr. Scott: We have received no such estimate from the trustees of the independent living fund. We are hoping to meet the trustees shortly to discuss their requirements for 1990-91.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many appeals tribunals regarding payment of severe disability premium have been adjourned to a later date within the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many appeals tribunals regarding payment of severe disability premium are waiting to be convened; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The administration of social security appeal tribunals is the responsibility of the president of the social security appeal tribunals, His Honour Judge Holden. The information requested cannot be obtained from the president's office as the administrative statistics for appeal tribunals are not broken down into data for specific income support premiums.

Income Support

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update the answer given to the hon. Member for Birkenhead on 30 January 1989, Official Report, column 70, about claimants and dependants on supplementary benefits income support.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is in the tables:

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the maximum net weekly incomes that would qualify for poll tax rebates for (a) an employee who is single and aged under 25 years, (b) an employee who is single and aged over 25 years, (c) a married couple with two children aged under 11 years, (d) a single pensioner aged 60 to 74 years and (e) a pensioner couple aged 60 to 74 years assuming poll tax levels of (i) £349, (ii) £381, (iii) £386, (iv) £391 and (v) £394, respectively.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is set out in the following table:

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Primary Schools

11. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in Staffordshire in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what was the comparable figure in 1978-79, at constant prices.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The most recent data available relate to 1987-88. In that year Staffordshire spent £980 per primary pupil, compared with £370 per pupil in cash terms in 1978-79. At 1987-88 prices, those figures are £980 and £755 respectively—a real-terms increase of nearly 30 per cent.

68. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to guarantee improved non-contact time for primary school teachers.

Mrs. Rumbold: The organisation of the school day and the duties to be undertaken by individual teachers in their 1,265 hours of directed time are matters for head teachers. The Interim Advisory Committee on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions has drawn attention in its third report to the scope that exists for LEAs and governing bodies to develop policies to increase teachers' non-contact time.

40. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to ensure that there are sufficient teachers available for primary schools in London in September 1990.

Mr. Alan Howarth: We are spending £159,000 in support of a London teacher recruitment campaign, which targets returners and mature new entrants, particularly women, who live locally. This campaign is also being supported by ILEA and the London boroughs.

My right hon. Friend recently gave consent to the Inner London education authority proposal to sell a number of properties and sites to the London teachers housing association. These will be used to provide some 250 housing units for teachers in inner London. I expect the scheme to help the inner London boroughs in their efforts to attract and retain teachers.

My right hon. Friend has also accepted in full the recommendations of the Interim Advisory Committee on Teachers' Pay and Conditions. These included an 8·8 per cent. increase in London weighting and a further discretionary supplement of £750 for inner London.

In addition, from April 1990 £4 million education support grant will be available over two years to support 45 LEAs, over half of them in London, to develop flexible and innovative recruitment packages aimed at returners.

GCSE Curriculum

13. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning curriculum overload for GCSE pupils arising from excessively time-consuming project work.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend and I continue to receive letters on this subject, although significantly fewer than in 1988, the first year of GCSE.

Grant-maintained Schools

14. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the number of schools to date which have elected to become direct grant-maintained.

Mr. MacGregor: Ballots have been held at 84 schools. Parents at 64 schools have so far voted in favour of proceeding with an application for grant-maintained status. I have approved 34 of the 46 proposals for grant-maintained status which have so far reached me for a decision.

66. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the guidelines for approval of grant-maintained status for schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) earlier today.

Nursery Education

15. Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to enable access to nursery education of children in every local education authority area.

24. Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to enable access to nursery education of children in every local education authority area.

62. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to enable access to nursery education of children in every local education authority area.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no such plans. It is for local education authorities, acting under their discretionary powers, to determine the extent and form of provision for the under-fives in their area.

School Repairs

16. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make an estimate of the current outstanding repairs in schools in England and Wales.

47. Mr. David Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make an estimate of current outstanding repairs on schools in England and Wales.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The DES school building survey in 1987 estimated the cost of implementing the main structural requirements related to the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981 and other physical requirements in primary and secondary schools in England was about £1·1 billion. Substantial sums have since been devoted to improving school premises. The repair of schools in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

60. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to ensure that schools are in good repair, prior to the local management of schools being effected.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin).

55. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps are being taken to assist local education authorities to maintain the upkeep of school-buildings.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The 1990-91 grant settlement allows for local authorities in England to spend almost £15 billion on education; that is over 9 per cent. higher than the comparable total for last year. Annual capital guidelines for capital works by LEAs for education are some £485 (compared with capital allocations, under the old system, of £352 million in 1989-90); and £118 million for the voluntary aided, special agreement and grant-maintained sectors. LEAs will continue to use capital receipts to increase expenditure above that financed by borrowing. It is for local education authorities and governors to maintain the upkeep of school buildings from within the resources available to them.

Research

17. Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has made of the cost of bringing scientific instruments for research in universities and polytechnics up to the current state of the art.

42. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provision he has made for the re-equipment of research laboratories in universities and polytechnics following the survey by his Advisory Board for the Research Councils of their instrumentation needs.

Mr. Jackson: The Advisory Board for the Research Councils' recent survey found that over three quarters of respondents regarded their present research equipment as adequate or better. Universities and polytechnics estimated that £259 million worth of additional equipment was needed to support current research interests. Our latest expenditure plans allow for further increases in spending on equipment.

70. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science who is responsible for the allocation of funds for research into different aspects of the global environment.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend allocates funds to the research councils to enable them to carry out programmes of research across a wide field, including global environmental research. It is for the research councils themselves to determine how to allocate the funds made available to them.

Local Management of Schools

18. Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made on local management of schools; and if he will make a statement.

28. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made on local management of schools; and if he will make a statement.

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made on local management of schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Eighty-seven local education authorities' schemes for local management of schools have received formal approval to come into force on 1 April this year, and 10 authorities have been informed that their schemes cannot be approved in their current form for introduction this year.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the operation of the local financial management of schools; and if he has given guidance to local authorities on the assessment of school budgets.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam). Decisions on total expenditure for school education are a matter for individual local education authorities. Under local management of schools those resources must be distributed by means of a formula which conforms to the guidelines set out in the Department's circular 7/88 and provides for the bulk of resources to be allocated according to pupil numbers and ages.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received from Norfolk local education authority in respect of preparations for local management of schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received no letters in 1990 from Norfolk local education authority about the local management of schools.

43. Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to introduce greater flexibility into schemes for local management of schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: There is ample flexibility for schemes for local management of schools to reflect local needs and priorities within the national criteria. In addition, there are simple arrangements which allow local education authorities to make changes to their approved schemes in the light of experience.

36. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on his decision to withhold approval of the scheme for local management of schools originally submitted by Leicestershire education authority; and what discussions his Department has since held with the authority.

Mrs. Rumbold: The scheme for the local management of schools submitted by Leicestershire LEA failed to meet a number of policy requirements, in particular in relation to its proposed funding formula. Officials from the Department will be visiting Leicestershire on 4 April to continue discussions with the authority, with the aim that an acceptable scheme can be designed and approved for introduction in April 1991.

Standard Spending Assessments

19. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what basis the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education were calculated.

29. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what basis the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education were calculated.

57. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education.

58. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie).

69. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to discuss the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education with Leicestershire county council.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no plans to discuss the education component of the 1990-91 standard spending assessment for education with Leicestershire county council.

Higher Education

20. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he intends to introduce to increase the participation rate of 16 to 19-year-olds in full-time education.

49. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to increase the level of achievement of 16 to 19-year-olds in full-time education.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the numbers of students in (a) full-time non-advanced further education, (b) full-time higher education at undergraduate or equivalent level and (c) full-time postgraduate study.

Mr. Jackson: In Great Britain universities, polytechnics and colleges during the academic year 1988-89 there were 494,000 students in full-time non-advanced further education, 554,000 students in full-time higher education at undergraduate level and 89,000 students on post-graduate courses.

54. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his target by 1992-93 for the participation of 16, 17 and 18-year-olds in full-time education; and if he will make a statement.

74. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his target by 1992-93 for the participation of 16, 17 and 18-year-olds in full-time education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: On current statistical assumptions, participation rates for 16, 17 and 18-year-olds in full-time education in schools and further education colleges in England are projected to rise from 49·9 per cent., 34·4 per cent. and 9·3 per cent. respectively in 1988-89 to 53·4 per cent., 38·3 per cent. and 9·6 per cent. by 1992-93. These figures do not include YTS trainees who attend college full-time. The Government believe that many more young people should be participating in education and training, both full-time and part-time.

Languages

21. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress is being made in encouraging the teaching of languages in schools so as to better prepare pupils for the opportunities of the European Community.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government have included a modern foreign language as a foundation subject in the national curriculum to be studied by all pupils between the ages of 11 and 16. Since last autumn, maintained schools in England have been required to offer all pupils aged 11 to 14 the opportunity of choosing to study at least one of the working languages of the European Community. Within this framework, we are encouraging schools to offer a greater diversity of languages and we are providing education support grants for pilot projects in some local education authorities in England to promote the preparation and implementation of plans for language diversification.

26. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of progress in developing new programmes for European language learning in secondary schools with particular emphasis on German, French and Spanish.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend announced on 15 March, Official Report, col. 322, the publication of the initial advice submitted by the national curriculum working group for modern foreign languages, and welcomed the progress which the group had made in developing the attainment targets and programmes of study for modern foreign languages in the national curriculum. The attainment targets and programmes of study apply to all the languages—including the main European Community languages, such as French, German and Spanish—which may qualify as the national curriculum modern foreign language foundation subject. I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of the working group's initial advice.

Student Loans

22. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the administration of the proposed student loans scheme.

30. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the administration of the proposed student loans scheme.

39. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the administration of the proposed student loans scheme.

Mr. Jackson: It is the Government's intention that, subject to the passage of the Education (Student Loans) Bill, the student loans scheme will be administered by the Student Loans Company. Preparatory work on the scheme is well in hand. The company has appointed senior staff, acquired premises in Glasgow and is presently testing the main computer system.

38. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he plans to issue further details of his proposals for a student loan scheme.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend will keep the House fully informed as to the development of the student loans scheme. Details of the certification and application process, the role of the academic institutions and arrangements for loans to minors were announced on 22 March, Official Report, column 709.

Teacher Vacancies

23. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what figures his Department holds for the number of teacher vacancies in England as at 1 January 1990 and at the recent equivalent date at the beginning of each of the years of the previous decade.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information on teacher vacancies in January 1990 is not yet available.

The number of vacancies for full-time permanent teachers in England in January of each year from 1980 to 1989 are shown in the table. Information on vacancies in nursery and primary schools was not collected before 1988.

	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Number of vacancies	As a percentage of full-time teachers in post	Number of vacancies	As a percentage of full-time teachers in post
1980	—	—	3,307	1·5

Eastern Europe (Scientists)

25. Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what additional support he has made available to British scientists seeking to build up contacts with eastern European scientists since the process of liberalisation began in 1989.

Mr. Jackson: In the 1989 public expenditure survey the science budget was increased by £175 million. I am sure that the research councils, the Royal Society and the Fellowship of Engineering will be considering the new opportunities in eastern Europe as they decide how they allocate the resources made available to them.

History Teaching

27. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish the final report of the national curriculum working party on history; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend is currently considering the final report of the history working group. He is hoping to publish the report shortly.

National Curriculum

31. Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning the speed at which the Government are implementing the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend frequently receives correspondence about the national curriculum. Some of it concerns the pace of implementation. We intend to implement the national curriculum as soon as practicable in order to raise standards of education. But we are phasing its introduction to make it more manageable for schools in accordance with our stated policy.

75. Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress there has been with the introduction of the parts of the national curriculum dealing with mathematics, science and technology.

Mrs. Rumbold: The national curriculum attainment targets and programmes of study for mathematics and for science came into force from the beginning of the last autumn term for children aged five and 11. Schools are preparing to apply the national curriculum requirements to seven-year-olds from this September.

The order for technology in the national curriculum was laid before Parliament on 6 March. Attainment targets and programmes of study will be introduced this autumn for children aged five, seven and 11 years of age.

63. Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representation he has recently received about the national curriculum; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend frequently receives correspondence from school governing bodies, teachers, parents and others about the national curriculum. It shows substantial support for the national curriculum in principle.

53. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to ensure that there are sufficient teachers available to teach the national curriculum in September 1990.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Since 1986 the Government have been pursuing a range of measures designed to attract people into teaching. These include the initial teacher training bursary scheme for shortage subjects, recently increased in value to £1,500, with £2,000 for physics students, and extended to include modern foreign languages; the education support grant scheme for school teacher recruitment; and support for a Londonwide recruitment campaign to attract qualified teacher returners. In addition, implementation of the licensed teacher scheme will ensure an increasing number of mature entrants.

We also plan a work experience scheme to give undergraduates experience of teaching. In addition, through the work of the teaching as a career unit and other ways, we will continue to publicise teaching as a career and to stimulate recruitment.

46. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about progress on the introduction of the national curriculum in Northumberland.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is for the Northumberland education authority in the first instance to monitor progress in introducing the national curriculum in the schools it maintains. However, evidence from Her Majesty's inspectors shows that schools across the country are in general making satisfactory progress in implementing the new requirements.

Cleveland County Council

32. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to discuss the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education with Cleveland county council.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no plans to discuss the education component of the 1990-91 standard spending assessment for education with Cleveland county council.

Research Councils

33. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many fellows of the Royal Society he expects to be made redundant as a result of restructuring by research councils.

Mr. Jackson: This information is not held centrally.

Special Educational Needs

34. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to increase the availability of integrated pre-school education for children with special educational needs.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if his Department plans any new initiatives to increase the integration of special needs students in mainstream schools.

Mr. Alan Howarth: It is the duty of local education authorities to keep under review the arrangements they make for special educational provision.

73. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what safeguards he has imposed to ensure that delegated budgets take into account the extra cost of the education of children with special educational needs.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 21 February, Official Report, column 795.

Basildon

35. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the reorganisation of sixth forms in Basildon.

Mr. Alan Howarth: On 24 January 1990 my right hon. Friend approved proposals to reorganise secondary and further education in the Basildon and Wickford areas. Several local comprehensive schools will now lose their sixth forms, and educational provision for pupils aged 16 to 19 will be concentrated in a new tertiary college.

Pupil Assessment

37. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for the assessment and testing of seven-year-olds; and if he will make a statement.

72. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for the assessment and testing of seven-year-olds; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Members to the reply which my right hon. Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 6 March, Official Report, column 578.

Gateshead

41. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to discuss the 1990-91 standard spending assessments for education with Gateshead metropolitan district council.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no plans to discuss the education component of the 1990-91 standard spending assessment for education with Gateshead metropolitan district council.

Pollution (Eastern Europe)

44. Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what support he is giving to research by British scientists on priorities in the reduction of pollution in eastern Europe.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend announced on 10 January that the science budget for 1990-91 will be £897 million. I am sure that the research councils, the Royal Society and the Fellowship of Engineering will be considering the new opportunities in eastern Europe as they decide how they allocate these funds. I understand that the Natural Environment Research Council is currently contributing to an international research programme on gaseous emission pollution in which several east European countries are participating. In addition, the Agricultural and Food Research Council's Institute of Arable Crops is currently engaged in a number of collaborative projects within eastern Europe. These include a joint initiative with Poland on nitrate and potassium movement in the soils, and a project with Bulgarian scientists on biological control of insects and nematode pests.

City Technology Colleges

45. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his Department's policy on encouragement of voluntary-aided city technology colleges.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has been interested to hear of plans by the London borough of Wandsworth for the establishment of a voluntary aided city technology college and will be giving careful consideration to the issues involved. He cannot prejudge the outcome of any statutory proposals which may come to him for decision.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to restore the negotiating rights of teachers' trades unions on pay and conditions of service.

48. Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will make a statement on the new machinery for determining teachers' pay to replace the interim advisory committee.

59. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what arrangements are being made for negotiating teachers' pay and conditions for 1991-92.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Members and my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway).

Examination Results

50. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence he has as to whether there is any correlation between the spending on education of local education authorities and the results achieved as they are monitored by examinations.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) on 18 January, Official Report, column 334. That shows that many authorities with relatively low spending per pupil achieve good examination results.

UNESCO

51. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will seek an increase in the science budget to renew United Kingdom membership of UNESCO.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is currently undertaking a review of United Kingdom membership of UNESCO and hopes to be able to announce the outcome in a few weeks' time.

Teacher Shortages

52. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made on measures being taken to tackle teacher shortages in inner London.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend accepted in full the recommendations of the Interim Advisory Committee on Teachers' Pay and Conditions. These included an 8·8 per cent. increase in London weighting and a further discretionary supplement of £750 for inner London. My right hon. Friend has also given consent to the Inner London education authority to sell a number of properties and sites to the London teachers housing association. These will provide some 250 homes for teachers in inner London.

Good progress is being made on other measures to tackle teacher shortages. The Government are contributing £159,000 to a London recruitment campaign which will target local returners to teaching. This will be supported by a substantial share of £2 million education support grant in each of the next two years.

The Department will continue to support the inner London LEAs in their efforts to recruit and retain sufficient teachers of the right quality.

Teacher Morale

61. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations his Department has received regarding the morale of teachers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend receives, as is normal, a substantial correspondence on general issues pertaining to the teaching profession, among them being morale.

Rural Schools

64. Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning the future of small schools in rural areas.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend regularly receives representations about rural primary schools which are the subject of reorganisation proposals.

Catholic Primary Schools

65. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about Catholic primary schools.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Representations have been received from various sources from time to time about Catholic primary schools, including one from my hon. Friend about St. Patrick's Roman Catholic primary school in Cleveland. I shall reply to my hon. Friend shortly.

Genetic Engineering

67. Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has made to the European Community Council of Science Ministers on the adoption by the European Community of British practices on the regulation of genetic engineering research and the release of genetically engineered organisms.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend has made no representations. The European Community Council of Environment Ministers has under consideration two directives on the contained use of genetically modified micro-organisms and the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms into the environment, both for research and development purposes and as products. Responsibility for these directives in the United Kingdom rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Social Security

71. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made of the effect on eligibility for access courses of the operation of the social security system.

Mr. Jackson: The so-called 21-hour rule administered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security permits unemployed adults to receive income support while studying part-time, so long as they are actively seeking work and are prepared to leave their studies immediately a suitable job opportunity arises. Unemployed people undertaking access courses can expect to receive income support in accordance with these criteria.

Inner London Education Authority

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a further statement on the arrangements being made for the London boroughs to take over the responsibilities of the Inner London education authority.

Mrs. Rumbold: The transfer process is going satisfactorily and schools and colleges in the 13 inner London LEAs will open for business as usual on Monday 2 April. I look forward to the development of an improved, more cost-effective and more responsive education service in inner London.

Speech Problems

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consideration his Department is currently giving to supplying communication aids to speech impaired children who require such aids in educational facilities.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Such provision, where prescribed for pupils with statements under the Education Act 1981, is the responsibility of LEAs. My officials, together with officials of the Department of Health have, however, been assessing whether the current arrangements for the assessment of children with communication handicaps meet the needs of those children in the most efficient and cost-effective way. My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will be considering in the light of their work whether any specific steps by the two Departments would be appropriate.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what qualifications a teacher is required to hold over and above the basic teaching certificate in order to specialise in work with children with specific language disorder.

Mr. Alan Howarth: None. However, within the local education authority training grants scheme there is a national priority area to support in-service training for designated teachers in ordinary schools who offer a general advisory service to their colleagues on special educational needs. Support for this training is at the discretion of the local education authorities.

The Department is funding a research project to identify the in-service training needs of teachers of children with speech and language disorders and to develop materials for a distance taught course.

Disabled Students Allowance

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will amend regulations to ensure that the disabled students' allowance is based on assessment of need in place of means testing.

Mr. Jackson: Assessments for the disabled students' allowance within mandatory awards already take into account relevant expenditure actually incurred by the student. In practice, a student will receive maintenance grant, including at least the amount assessed for this allowance, unless the parental or other contribution is based on quite high levels of income. My right hon. Friend regards this as a reasonable balance between public and family support for such students. He has no present plans to treat the allowance differently from other elements of the mandatory award by excluding it from means testing.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what date he expects to announce his Department's new arrangements for the disabled students' allowance.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend announced improvements in the disabled students' allowance for the academic year 1990-91 in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) on 19 March, Official Report, col. 417-18. Revised mandatory awards regulations will be laid before Parliament in the summer, and any necessary guidance will be issued to local education authorities and students then.

Speech Therapists

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to collect details of the number of speech therapists either employed or funded by each education authority in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Council of Local Education Authorities has discussed with officials of the Department and the Department of Health a number of issues relating to the responsibilities of district health authorities and local education authorities in respect of the provision of speech therapy services. I expect to meet members of the Council to discuss these issues quite soon.

Medical Specialties (Chairs)

Mr. Jack Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list the medical specialties for which there is only one academic chair;

(2) if he will list the number of chairs in audiological medicine, giving the universities at which they are held and the date at which they were established;

(3) if he will list the number of chairs in ear, nose and throat pathology, giving the universities at which they are held and the date at which they were established;

(4) if he will list the number of chairs in otolaryngology, giving the universities at which they are held and the date at which they were established.

Mr. Jackson: This information is not collected centrally. In any case, professorial titles or occupancy of chairs do not provide a reliable guide to the teaching and research that institutions undertake.

Postgraduate Medical Institutes

Mr. Jack Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will establish an inquiry into the amount and security of the finance provided for the postgraduate medical institutes which joined large medical schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The funding of medical schools is a matter for the universities concerned, in consultation as necessary with the Universities Funding Council.

Students (Housing Benefit)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the average amount of housing benefit claimed by students (a) outside

London who claim more than £310 per academic year and (b) in London who claim more than £340 per academic year.

Mr. Jackson: Government records of students' housing benefit claims are not collected centrally in the detail requested. However, I understand that Department of Social Security management information returns for May 1988 show that the average benefit receipt among all those students who were claiming housing benefit at that time was £7·80 per week, or just under £300 for those students who claim over the whole academic year.

In addition, Research Services Limited collected information about students' social security claims when conducting its 1988-89 survey of student income and expenditure. A copy of the survey report is in the Library.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the number of students outside London who claim more than £310 per academic year in housing benefit; and who in London claim more than £340 per academic year in housing benefit.

Mr. Jackson: Government records of students' housing benefit claims are not collected centrally in the detail requested. However, I understand that Department of Social Security management information returns for May 1988 show that there was a total of 78,000 students claiming housing benefit at that time.

In addition, Research Services Limited collected information about students' social security claims when conducting its 1988-89 survey of student income and expenditure. A copy of the survey report is in the Library.

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of people aged 18 to 24 years currently undertaking non-advanced further education full-time and higher education full-time; and what percentage of the total population of 18 to 24-year-olds this represents.

Mr. Jackson: In Great Britain universities, polytechnics and colleges during the academic year 1988-89 there were 110,000 and 392,000 students aged 18 to 24 years on non-advanced further education courses and higher education courses respectively, representing together about 8 per cent. of the population of 18 to 24-year-olds in Great Britain.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the present pupil-teacher ratio in (a) primary and (b) post-primary schools in England.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In January 1989 the pupil-teacher ratios in maintained primary and secondary schools in England were 22·0 and 15·3 respectively.

School Budgets (Exceptions)

Mr. Critchley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the percentage of its general schools budget which every local education authority has removed as mandatory and discretionary exceptions.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) on 5 February 1990, Official Report, col. 451.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Science Students

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the cost of educating a science student to Ph.D. level in a university in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Japan, (c) the United States of America, (d) Scandinavia and (e) the countries of the European Community.

Mr. Jackson: The data requested are not available by subject and level of course.

Universities (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the figure for 1990-91 for planned capital expenditure for universities in the public expenditure White Paper, Cm. 1011, is on a basis consistent with that for polytechnics and colleges.

Mr. Jackson: I regret that the figures for planned capital expenditure by the Universities Funding Council in table 11.1 of the public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 1011) are not shown on a consistent basis for each year. Figures on a consistent basis are shown in the following table. The percentage increase in planned capital expenditure in 1990-91 is broadly the same for each sector of higher education.

	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91
Universities Funding Council
Capital	141	139	152 (175)
Current	1,585	1,713	1,685 (1,661)

Note: Figures as shown in Cm. 1011 in brackets.

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total amount spent by his Department in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by his Department in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that his Department has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mrs. Rumbold: This Department spent £685,000 on computer and management consultancies in the 1989-90 financial year and has budgeted for £540,000 for 1990-91. Contracts awarded in 1989-90 were as follows:

History Working Party

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) when he first received the draft of the final report of the history working party;

(2) when he first received the final report of the history working party;

(3) on what dates in the last year he has met Commander Saunders Watson, chairman of the history working party;

(4) when he expects to publish the final report of the history working party.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend saw a draft of the history working group's report just before Christmas, and received the final report on 31 January. He will publish it soon. He met Commander Saunders Watson on 4 August last year and 10 January this year.

Pensions

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the average pension paid to head teachers who retired in 1989; and what was the average pension received by head teachers who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(2) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by lecturers in higher education on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(3) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by lecturers in further education on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(4) what is the value, at current prices, of the average pension received by head teachers on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(5) what is the value at current prices of the average pension received by teachers on their retirement in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(6) what was the average pension paid for lecturers in higher education who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension currently received by lecturers in higher education in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(7) what was the average pension received by lecturers in further education who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969;

(8) what was the average pension paid to teachers who retired in 1989; and what is the average pension currently received by teachers who retired in (a) 1979 and (b) 1969.

Mr. Alan Howarth [pursuant to his reply, 26 March 1990, c. 35-36.]: The average rate of pension paid to teachers, head teachers and lecturers who retired in 1989 was as follows:

Teachers	5,010
Head teachers	8,460
Lecturers	5,990

WALES

Footpaths and Bridleways

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, for each of the years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989, the number of temporary traffic regulation orders made by local authorities under section 14 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to restrict or prohibit the use of footpaths or bridleways for which he gave consent under section 15(2) of that Act for an extension of the period for which the order was in force.

Mr. Roberts: Temporary traffic orders affecting footpaths and bridleways are not separately identified from those affecting road traffic and no records are kept.

Infertility Services

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the infertility services provided by each health authority in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Information on infertility services provided by health authorities is not held centrally.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to charge-cap any Welsh local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I will decide whether to introduce community charge limitation in Wales in 1990-91 in the light of my consideration of Welsh authorities' expenditure plans.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the rules he intends to use for poll tax-capping in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: No.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the number of additional staff employed to administer the community charge in Wales (a) in total, (b) by county council and (c) by district council.

Mr. Grist: This information is not held centrally.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the present pupil-teacher ratio for (a) primary and (b) post primary schools in Wales.

Mr. Roberts: At January 1989, pupil-teacher ratio was 22·3 for primary schools and 15·4 for secondary schools.

Health Authorities

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the figures provided to him by each health authority in Wales in respect of (a) the authority's own estimate of the shortfall due to inflation in 1989-90 and (b) the figure by which each authority estimates it is underfunded for 1990-91.

Mr. Grist: My right hon. Friend and I have seen copies of reports from the treasurers of district health authorities in Wales to their chairmen's committee concerning the financial position of Welsh DHAs generally in the current financial year and their projections for 1990-91. These reports give estimates of shortfalls in funding in both years on the basis of estimates of inflation and other financial pressures. However, they fail to take account of the resources to be released to supplement allocations through the attainment of targets for cost improvements and income generation. They therefore understate the resources available to authorities to meet the financial pressures which they face. So long as minimum cost improvement and income generation targets are achieved —which should be possible in any well-managed authority —allocations in both years should be more than sufficient to meet these financial pressures.

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount spent by the Welsh Development Agency in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by the Welsh Development Agency in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that the Welsh Development Agency has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Welsh Development Agency has spent £139,534 on the following consultancy contracts in 1989:

Company	Assignment
Ernst and Young	Documentation for users of new computer systems and advice on implementing new systems.
P J Sullivan	Development of integrated data bases from existing computer systems.
Beaufort Research	Monitoring effectiveness of Agency marketing campaign in Wales
Numbers Research	Monitoring effectiveness of Agency marketing campaign outside of Wales.
Taylor Nelson	Monitoring effectiveness of Agency food initiative marketing campaign.
BJM	Customer attitudes monitoring.

The agency estimates that £150,000 will be spent on such contracts in 1990.

Myodil

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of people in each health authority area in Wales who have been affected adversely by the use of myodil in connection with X-ray tests.

Mr. Grist: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

ENERGY

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total amount spent by his Department in 1989 on management and computer contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by his Department in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that his Department has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department spent £618,000 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases, in the financial year 1989-90.

Contracts placed with private sector firms and companies for management and computer consultancies during 1989-90 were:

Consultants	Subject
Price Waterhouse	Advice on, and implementation of, databases related to North Sea oil and gas activity.
KPG	Transfer of data from magnetic tape to optical disk.
J. P. Kenny	Advice on electronic storage of petroleum maps.
BIS	Advice on local area networks for computers.
Businessland	Advice on data communication links.
Specialist Services Scotland	Development of industrial capabilities database for the Offshore Supplies Office
Oracle (UK) Ltd.	Development of a database for recording offshore safety incidents.
Saxton Bampfylde	Recruitment consultants for chairman of North Western Electricity Board.
Russell Reynolds	Recruitment consultants for chairman of National Power.
TDA Consulting group Ltd.	Management training.
Jonathan Coates and Associates	Management training.
TFC Ltd.	Management training.
Brewster Computer Training Ltd.	IT training.
FI Word Processing Services Ltd.	IT training.
PST Ltd.	IT training.

My Department has budgeted to spend an estimated £750,000 on management and computer consultancy in the financial year 1990-91.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Disarmament

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all the current fora in which east-west disarmament talks are taking place.

Mr. Maude: NATO and the Warsaw pact are negotiating on conventional armed forces in Europe in Vienna, and at the open skies conference due to resume in Budapest next month; and (together with the neutral and non-aligned countries) on confidence and security-building measures in Vienna. Forty nations take part in the chemical weapons talks at the conference on disarmament in Geneva. The United States and the Soviet Union are negotiating on START and on nuclear testing, also in Geneva.

Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there is likely to be a conference on security and co-operation in Europe this year.

Mr. Maude: A meeting of the Heads of State or Government of the CSCE participating states is likely to be held in the course of this year. The CSCE intersessional meetings for 1990 agreed at the Vienna follow-up meeting will also take place.

Purchasing Costs

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department achieved the target of a 5 per cent. saving in purchasing costs in 1988-89 through use of the central unit on purchasing.

Mr. Maude: Yes. In 1988-89, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office achieved purchasing savings of 9·1 per cent.

Cuba

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the United States of America to restore normal relations with Cuba; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: None.

Nigeria

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will request the Nigerian authorities to expedite the issue of temporary employment visas for United Kingdom nationals carrying out duties in Nigeria with a stay of less than 90 days.

Mr. Maude: Under Nigerian rules, applications for temporary employment visas have to be referred to Nigeria for decision. We regularly press the Nigerian authorities to reduce delays to a minimum, and have been able to help with some individual cases.

German Democratic Republic

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the elections in the German Democratic Republic.

Mr. Maude: We welcome the recent elections in the GDR, which all observers consider to have been free and fair. We look forward to developing relations with the new Government once formed.

Baltic States

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy towards self-determination in Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia.

Mr. Maude: We have never recognised de jure the incorporation of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania into the Soviet Union in 1940. We recognise the right of the Baltic peoples to say what their own future should be.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards political developments in (a) Lithuania, (b) Estonia and (c) Latvia.

Mr. Maude: We support the right of the Baltic peoples to decide their own future, and have welcomed the considerable progress made in the past two years.

Against the background of recent developments we now think it vital that the dialogue between the Soviet authorities and the Lithuanians should continue. We attach particular importance to the repeated statements by the Soviet leadership that there is no question of use of force.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will meet leaders of the Sajudis Popular Front of Lithuania.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has no plans for any such meeting.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the political situation in (a) Lithuania, (b) Estonia and (c) Latvia.

Mr. Maude: The Soviet Union is well aware of our view that the Baltic peoples should be enabled to determine their own future. We have made clear to the Russians our concern about the situation in Lithuania and our firm view that continued dialogue between the Soviet authorities and the Lithuanians is essential.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by the Baltic states to the British Government concerning the Baltic gold deposited for safekeeping with the Bank of England at the outbreak of the war.

Mr. Maude: The criteria which we apply to the recognition of a state are explained in the answer which the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) gave to a question by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 19 March. It would be open to the Government of any future independent state in Estonia, Latvia or Lithuania to make representations on the subject of gold deposits.

Buchenwald Exhibition

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to Buchenwald concentration camp to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Maude: I understand that, under procedures agreed by the Services Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 11 to 15 June.

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total amount spent by his Department in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by his Department in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that his Department has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mr. Maude: We estimate that our expenditure in the financial year 1989-90 on management and computer consultancy will be:

Management consultancy	232,100
Computer consultancy	1,691,710

Individual contracts awarded during the year were:

Management consultancies

There is no specific budgetary provision of management consultancy for the financial year 1990-91, but our present estimated expenditure is £37,500. The budget for computer consultancy is £1,430,000.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the number of cases where the Crown prosecution service has failed to prosecute when a coroner's court has brought in a verdict of unlawful killing during the last five years.

The Attorney-General: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total amount spent by his Department in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by his Department in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that his Department has budgeted to spend in the current year.

The Attorney-General: No expenditure on management and computer consultancy contracts was incurred by the legal secretariat to the Law Officers in 1989-90, and no such expenditure is expected by the Treasury Solicitor's Department. In 1989-90 the Crown prosecution service spent £550,000 on management and computer consultancy contracts, while the Serious Fraud Office estimates its expenditure to be nil in respect of management consultancy contracts, but £213,000 in respect of computer consultancy contracts in 1989-90. The contracts awarded by the Crown prosecution service in 1989-90 were as follows:

PA Management Consultants—staffing model development study,

The Human Science and Advanced Technology Research Centre, Loughborough University—evaluation of the use of information technology to present evidence in court,

Kinesis Computing Limited—assistance with legal information feasibility study,

Cumulus Software Limited—training and assistance with changes to case tracking software,

Aims Systems Limited—assistance with formal specification of SCOPE case management project,

Yale Data Management Limited—assistance with the production of the SCOPE operational requirement and procurement.

The computer consultancy contracts awarded by the Serious Fraud Office were as follows:

Digitus—systems analysis, design and implementation of computerised case tracking system,

ITL—preparation of computer manual for document control system,

Digitus—programming amendments to computer system for document control,

Digitus—systems acceptance of case tracking and investigation system,

Ultracomp—preparation of performance tests for case tracking and investigation system,

CCTA—IT strategy study,

S & S Enterprises Limited—recovery of data from disc.

The total amounts the legal secretariat to the Law Officers, the Treasury Solicitor's Department, the Crown prosecution service and Serious Fraud Office have budgeted to spend in 1990-91 are nil, £5,000, £395,000 and £200,000 respectively.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total amount spent by the Land Registry in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by the Land Registry in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that the Land Registry has budgeted to spend in the current year.

The Attorney-General: Management and computer consultancy contracts were awarded by the Land Registry in 1989 as follows:

Management Consultancy

Industrial Training Service Ltd.—Programme to develop management training.

Computer Consultancy

Business Information Management—Technical advice on a requirement document for procurement of a new digital mapping system.

PAFEC Ltd.—An investigation into techniques for the colour scanning of map records.

Intergraph (UK) Ltd.—Software development of the Registry's Intergraph System.

Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency—Departmental Support Agreement providing ongoing technical advice support and Information Technology procurement services.

The Land Registry estimates that its expenditure in the financial year 1989-90, including expenditure on CCTA will be £42,899·70, and for 1990-91 a budget of £50,000 has been set.

PRIME MINISTER

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total amount spent by the Cabinet Office in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if she will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by the Cabinet Office in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that the Cabinet Office has budgeted to spend in the current year.

The Prime Minister: The expenditure by the Cabinet Office on management and computer consultancies, excluding purchases of hardware and software, is estimated to be £163,900 in 1989-90. The management and computer consultancy contracts let by the Cabinet Office during 1989-90 are as follows:

Firm	Assignment
Coopers and Lybrand	Pilot study on evaluation

AIDS

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the reasons for the resignation of Dr. Jonathan Mann, the director and founder of the World Health Organisation's global programme on AIDS; and if he will make it his policy to freeze the British contribution to that programme until he is satisfied about the future effectiveness of that programme in the absence of Dr. Mann.

Mrs. Chalker: The reasons for Dr. Mann's resignation are a matter between him, the World Health Organisation and its director general. The Government's interest is to work for the continuation of an effective global programme on AIDS.

An acting director of the WHO global programme on AIDS, Dr. M. Merson, has taken office. We shall be working closely with him and will continue to monitor carefully, with other donors, the progress of the programme. We shall consider future United Kingdom support and its timing in the light of real practical progress and developments.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drugs

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many intravenous drug users in Her Majesty's prisons were HIV sero-positive in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Because HIV antibody tests are carried out only with informed consent, the antibody status of intravenous drug users identified while in prison custody will not always be known. Since June 1987 prison medical officers have reported the risk category or categories of identified HIV-infected prisoners. In the last seven months of that year, 41 of the cases were reported to be in the intravenous drug user category. The corresponding figures for the full calendar years 1988 and 1989 were 60 and 44 respectively.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the breakdown of known drug users on the Home Office notification index by enumeration districts of the small area statistics of the 1981 census in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily available. The tables on addicts notified to the Home Office in 1989 published in "Statistics of the Misuse of Drugs: addicts notified to the Home Office, United Kingdom, 1989 Area tables", a copy of which is in the Library, break down some information by police force and local authority areas. Figures for district health authorities are also available on request, for England, from the Department of Health.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of (a) black or other ethnic minority and (b) white drug possession offenders were (i) cautioned and (ii) charged for each police force in 1989.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the ethnic background of drug possession offenders is not held centrally.

Deportation

Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many defendants found guilty of crimes of violence have been recommended for deportation by the courts over the past five years;

(2) where the Home Office has served a notice to deport, in how many cases over the last five years this was following a drugs-related offence; and in how many cases it was following an offence of violence to the person.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that this information is not readily available.

Farzad Bazoft

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what name Farzad Bazoft first entered the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On entry the name was recorded as Farzad Robati-Bazoft.

Mr. Dicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) on what grounds the recommendation of the judge for the deportation of Farzad Bazoft was overruled;

(2) what evidence was available at the time the decision was made not to deport Mr. Farzad Bazoft to indicate that his life would be at risk if he were to return to Iran; and what was the source of that evidence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It was decided not to deport Mr. Bazoft to Iran because of documentary evidence that he would be arrested by the Iranian authorities because of his political opinions. It is not the practice to disclose sources of evidence in individual asylum cases.

South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the result of the discussions he had with members of the South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority in respect of their 1990-91 financial situation.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State met at their request a delegation from South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority on 15 January to listen to their concerns about the standard spending assessment for the authority for 1990-91, which is 11·8 per cent. greater than their grant-related expenditure assessment for 1989-90.

My right hon. and noble Friend took note of the concerns expressed and Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services will monitor closely the operational capacity of the South Yorkshire fire service. Ministers have agreed to consider any new evidence on standard spending assessments with regard to the possibility of making changes for 1991-92 if this should prove necessary.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received concerning value added tax on food; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has received a number of representations.

Payroll Tax

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he has given to the implementation of a payroll tax similar to that in the United States of America.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has no plans to introduce such a tax.

Married Couple's Allowance

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to the Exchequer at the 1990-91 tax rates announced in the Budget of the married couple's allowance; and how much of this cost is attributable to taxpayers aged below 65 years.

Mr. Lilley: The direct revenue cost in a full year, at 1990-91 levels of income, of the married couple's allowance is estimated to be about £5·5 billion, of which £4·8 billion is attributable to married couples where both the husband and wife are aged under 65. The extra relief is worth £8·27 per week to a basic rate taxpayer not entitled to a higher, age-related, allowance.

Estimates are based on a projection of the 1987-88 survey of personal incomes and are provisional.

Budget (Gains)

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gain per individual arising from each relevant component of the 1990 Budget, both at current prices and net of indexation for those at one half and three quarters of average earnings, average earnings and one and a half, two, five and 10 times average earnings; and if he will provide comparable figures for each Budget since 1979.

Mr. Lilley: Individuals will benefit directly or indirectly from many Budget measures. These gains will vary according to their specific circumstances, as well as their level of earnings, and it would be impracticable to attempt to estimate the effects of all the measures listed in table 4.1 of the 1990 FSBR, let alone for each Budget since 1979. Information on the effects of specific measures may be found in the press notices issued each Budget day by Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) of 15 March, Official Report, column 654, if he will give for the years 1988 and 1989 the total amount of mortgage interest paid, distinguishing between changes due to changes in the level of interest rates and changes due to changes in the stock of mortgages; and what is the number of mortgages outstanding and their average size as at 31 December 1987, 31 December 1988 and 31 December 1989.

Mr. Lilley: The latest estimates are that total mortgage interest payments grew from £22·1 billion in 1988 to £32·3 billion in 1989; 53 per cent. of the increase was due to the effect of the increase in interest rates on the stock of mortgages in 1988 and 47 per cent. to the effect of the increase in stock in 1989, including the effect of the rise in the interest rate on the increase in stock. Estimates of the numbers of mortgages outstanding and their average size in the last three financial years are given in the table:

Mortgages qualifying for income tax relief

	Outstanding mortgages (thousands)	Average size of mortgage (£)
1987-88	8,750	17,000
[1]1988-89	9,100	21,000
[1]1989-90	9,300	24,500

[1] Provisional.

Consultancies

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount spent by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mr. Ryder: The total amount spent by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in the financial year 1989-90 was £3,251,798.

The consultancy firms awarded contracts in management and computer consultancy, excluding hardware and software purchases, are as follows:

The total amount budgeted to be spent in the year 1990-91 by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise is £4,544,000.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount spent by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that Her Majesty's Stationery Office has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mr. Ryder: The total amount spent in 1989 was £290,000 and the budget for 1990 is £480,000.

The following contracts were awarded in 1989:

Firm	Subject of Assignment
NCC	Advice on electronic data interchange
Batalas	Quality assurance audit (BS 5750)
Mortiboys	Quality assurance audit (BS 5750)
David Hutchins Associates	Total quality management
CCTA	General IT consultancy

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount spent by the Inland Revenue in 1989 on management and computer consultancy contracts, excluding hardware and software purchases; if he will list each management or computer consultancy contract awarded by the Inland Revenue in 1989, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment; and what is the total amount that the Inland Revenue has budgeted to spend in the current year.

Mr. Lilley: The amount spent by the Inland Revenue in the financial year 1989-90 on management and computer consultancy contracts excluding hardware and software purchases is expected to be about £16·1 million.

The Inland Revenue has awarded the following consultancy contracts in 1989-90:

Touche Ross Management Consultants: Records Management
Printing Industry Research Association: Reprographics
HMSO Technical Services: Reprographics
Organisations and Systems Innovations Ltd.: BROCS Project Office
Oracle (UK) Ltd.: Systems development
Henley Business Systems Ltd.: Evaluation of MIDAS software
Expertech: Expert systems for BROCS
Gmb Support Ltd.: IR Suggestions Scheme
BIS Applied Systems Ltd.: Security risk assessment of systems
IMB UK Ltd.: Systems development
Trident Computer Services Ltd.: COVA project support
Inforem: Technical support

A budget of £17 million has been allocated by the Inland Revenue for the financial year 1990-91.

Default Surcharge

Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the review of the operation and impact of the default surcharge has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ryder: The review we announced in July 1988 has been completed. A very thorough examination of the operation and effectiveness of the default surcharge was carried out and very careful consideration was given to the submissions made by many interested parties. We have, however, no plans for changes at the present time, although the matter will be kept under constant review.

Commemorative Coins

Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if Her Majesty's Government have plans to issue any new commemorative coins.

Mr. Major: Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to approve my recommendation that a special £5 crown be issued to commemorate the 90th birthday of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother. There will be a normal version of the coin issued at face value, and collectors' versions in precious metal and base metal, issued at a premium.

Finance Bill

Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Finance Bill will be published.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Finance Bill will be published on Thursday 19 April.

ENVIRONMENT

Deputy Secretaries

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the responsibilities of each of the deputy secretaries in his Department and the numbers and ranks of staff reporting to each.

Mr. Chris Patten: There are six deputy secretaries in DOE (central). Their responsibilities are planning, inner cities and rural affairs; local government and finance; environmental protection; legal services; housing, construction and sport; and establishments and the built heritage. The planning inspectorate and regional directors also report to the deputy secretary responsible for establishments and the built heritage. There are a further three deputy secretaries in the Property Services Agency.

The numbers of staff by grade reporting to each of the deputy secretaries in DOE(C) on 1 February are set out in the table.

There are also certain groups within DOE(C) which do not report through a deputy secretary. These consist of private offices (with 63 staff) and information (with 44 staff).

The figures also exclude staff at the Historic Royal Palaces Agency which became an executive agency on 2 October 1989, and the Building Research Establishment, which it is proposed should become an executive agency on 2 April 1990.

I will write to my hon. Friend with further information regarding the Property Services Agency.

Hindu Temple, Hertsmere

Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce his decision concerning the planning application for a Hindu temple to be built in the borough of Hertsmere.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) on 20 March at columns 600-17.

Disabled People (Housing)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to encourage local housing authorities to provide home improvement agency services to disabled home owners where voluntary sector agencies do not operate.

Mr. Chope: My Department is currently reviewing the best way of using the provisions in section 169 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 relating to the provision and long-term funding of home improvement agency services, including those for the disabled. I hope to be able to make an announcement later this year.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department will take steps to place a duty on local housing authorities to replace properties sold to disabled people under the right to buy.

Mr. Chope: No. Such properties are not lost to the housing stock, and would in any case not be available for re-letting so long as the secure tenants remained in occupation.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish a table showing the Government's percentage contribution to local expenditure for each year since 1978-79 together with a forecast for (a) the current financial year and (b) 1990-91 based on the budgets which have been agreed by the local authorities to date.

Mr. Chope: The available information is as given in the table:

Aggregate Exchequer grant as percentage of relevant expenditure

	Per cent.
1978-79	59·8
1979-80	58·6
1980-81	57·2
1981-82	54·9
1982-83	51·7
1983-84	50·1
1984-85	50·0
1985-86	49·0
1986-87	45·4
1987-88	44·4
1988-89	42·5
[1]1989-90	40·5

[1] Based on local authority budgets.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by local authority area the total amount paid in lieu of non-domestic rates by formula-rated properties in 1989-90 and the equivalent contribution being made to the non-domestic pool in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 27 March 1990]: The information that the hon. Member has requested is not held centrally for 1989-90. For 1990-91 the aggregate of the rates bills of those industries appearing on the central rating list for England whose rateable values are set by order is estimated to be £863 million.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish figures showing how the contribution paid in lieu of non-domestic rates by Oxfordshire formula-rated properties is to be redistributed in Oxfordshire in 1990-91.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 27 March 1990]: From 1 April rates paid by the industries whose rateable values are fixed by order will be collected by the Secretary of State and paid into the non-domestic rate pool. Attribution of rateable values to properties occupied by these industries in particular local authority areas will no longer be necessary. The proceeds of the non-domestic rate pool will be distributed to charging authorities in proportion to their population of community charge payers.

Regional Planning Guidance

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he is next going to issue new regional planning guidance for the period up to the year 2006.

Mr. Moynihan: The current regional planning guidance for the south-east region is contained in planning policy guidance note PPG9. SERPLAN (the London and south-east regional planning conference) is conducting a regional review, and hopes to submit advice to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment after its July 1990 conference. After considering that advice, my right hon. Friend will issue a draft for consultation, before finalising his new regional planning guidance. This will probably occur during 1991.

West Midlands Residuary Body

Mr. Bevan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he has given to the West Midlands residuary body in relation to the disposal of land at Church lane, West Bromwich, known as the former Johnsons Rolls site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: In response to a request from the board of the West Midlands residuary body I issued a direction on 20 March 1990, under section 65 of the Local Government Act 1985 requiring the residuary body to dispose of all its interests in the land at Church lane, West Bromwich to the Black Country development corporation on or before 30 April 1990. I have today placed a copy of the direction in the Library of the House.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the future status of the Building Research Establishment.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am pleased to announce that on 2 April the Building Research Establishment (BRE) is to become an executive agency in the Department of the Environment under the next steps initiative. This will provide the establishment with new freedoms and will improve its ability to serve the needs of Government, the construction industry and building users. I am placing a copy of the policy and resources framework document for the new agency in the Libraries of both Houses.

The key performance indicators of the agency are set out in the framework document. The principal targets for 1990-91 are:

the average overhead rate
the average technical man day rate the utilisation rate for chargeable staff
non-Exchequer income as a percentage of total income

In addition, the target net vote cost of the agency will be £1·764 million in 1990-91. The agency will be expected to make efficiency savings equivalent to at least 2 per cent. a year.

TRANSPORT

Ro-Ro Ferries

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce regulations to change the layout of roll on/roll off ferries, in order to ease the evacuation procedure in case of emergency.

Mr. McLoughlin: Evacuation procedures are governed by regulations made under the Merchant Shipping Acts. The Department of Transport has sponsored research into evacuation from roll on/roll off passenger ferries in an emergency. The results and recommendations of this research have been put to the International Maritime Organisation for consideration by the Maritime Safety Committee later this year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Local Government Finance

45. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has had on the poll tax rebate system; and if he will make a statement.

46. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has had concerning poll tax rebates; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Ministers receive correspondence on a range of issues, both from hon. Members and from their constituents. In the last six months, 1,053 items of correspondence have been received by the Department about the community charge benefit scheme, but it is not possible to identify the number relating particularly to rebates in Scotland.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to extend the period for poll tax rebate.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) on 23 March at column 788.

Disabled People

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people will benefit from the new measures to help disabled people who do not qualify for attendance allowance or mobility allowance.

Mr. Scott: We estimate that some 140,000 people will benefit from the new lower rate of the care component of the new disability allowance and some 150,000 from the initial rate of the mobility component.

Ex-Miners (Reduced Earnings Allowance)

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many retired or redundant miners are eligible for an increase in their reduced earnings allowance following the successful appeal to the social security appeal tribunal on 8 March by Gerald Linsdell; and what steps he is taking to notify potential claimants.

Mr. Scott: The decision of the social security appeal tribunal dealt only with the circumstances of Mr. Linsdell's claim and is not considered to have wider implications.

Community Charge

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security by how much the community charge of a pensioner couple, living in a district with a community charge of £380, will be reduced as a result of the Chancellor's statement, where their only income is the state retirement pension and they have savings of (a) £8,000, (b) £12,000 and (c) £16,000.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is shown in the table.

Pensioner couple aged 60 to 74, receiving state retirement pension for a couple of £75·10 a week, with a community charge of £380 each.

Savings £	Community charge benefit (per week) £
8,000	8·72
12,000	6·32
16,000	3·92

Pensioner Premium

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will introduce regulations to pay the higher pensioner premium to all persons on income support who were in receipt of invalidity benefit when they reached retirement age; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We have no plans to do so.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his estimate of the cost of paying higher pensioner premium to all those who fail to be entitled to it solely because they transferred from invalidity pensions to retirement pensions on the advice of his Department; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of people who fail to be entitled to higher pensioner premium solely because they transferred from invalidity pensions to retirement pensions on the advice of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The formal and informal advice given by the Department reflects the contemporaneous position in law and any known forthcoming changes in it. Information on which to base the requested estimates, of people who are not entitled to the higher pensioner premium because they retired before the introduction of income support, is not available.

Social Fund

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the budgetary totals for (a) DSS offices relating to Leyton residents, (b) Londonwide and (c) nationally for (i) grants and (ii) loans from the social fund in 1988-89 and 1989-90 and his estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Scott: Information about the social fund grants and loans budget allocations nationally, for each social security region and each local office for 1988-89 and 1989-90 is in the Library. I refer the hon. Member to my statement on Monday 26 March concerning the budget allocations for 1990-91. I have placed that information in the Library.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest figure for the total repayments of social fund loans in the current financial year.

Mr. Scott: Loan repayments in 1989-90 as at 28 February 1990 were provisionally £99 million.

Independent Living Fund

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the total expenditure for the independent living fund for the year 1989-90 for (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the London borough of Lewisham.

Mr. Scott: The total expenditure for the independent living fund from 1 April 1989 to 28 February 1990 for the United Kingdom is £8·3 million. Information for Lewisham is not available separately.

Regional Offices

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what functions his Department carries out at the regional level; where the regional offices are located in each of the regions; what staff are employed and at what grades; what proportion of his Department's budget is spent in each of the regions; and what geographical boundaries determine his Department's regions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [pursuant to her reply, 21 March 1990, c. 639-41.]: The information in table 3 was found to be incorrect. The corrected information is given in the following table.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inspectors' Reports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 26 February, Official Report, columns 16-17, when he expects to publish the inspectors' reports hitherto not published.

Mr. Redwood: Of the inspectors' reports listed in my reply, the decision whether to publish remains under consideration in respect of 12 reports relating to the following companies:

Alexander Howden Group plc
British Anzani plc
Medway Secondary Metals Limited
Guinness plc (interim)
Aldermanbury Trust plc (interim)
Consolidated Gold Fields plc (two interims)
Graylaw Holdings Limited and Link Service Stations Limited
Bank Street Securities Limited
Pennine Commercial Holdings plc
The Animal Defence Society Limited
Minet Holdings plc and
WMD Underwriting Agencies Limited (final)

House of Fraser Holdings plc was published on 7 March. The other reports will not be published.

Accountancy Bodies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make it his policy as a condition of recognition, to require the accountancy bodies seeking supervisory recognition under the Companies Act 1989 to hold their meetings in the open, with access for members.

Mr. Redwood: No. It is for a supervisory body itself to decide what arrangements are appropriate for informing its members of matters of concern to them.

Inspectors

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who advises him on the appointment of inspectors from accountancy firms.

Mr. Redwood: I select the appropriate person for appointment as an accountant inspector; in doing so I take into account the views of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

Investment Businesses

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications by investment businesses for authorisation under the Financial Services Act have been rejected to date; and how many of those applications were made to each of the self-regulatory organisations and to the Securities and Investments Board, respectively.

Mr. Redwood: This is a matter for the Securities and Investments Board and the self-regulatory organisations, but I understand that the figures are not available because of difficulties of definition.

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many investment businesses are trading with interim authorisation under the Financial Services Act at the latest available date; and if he will provide an analysis of these showing (a) those subject to the appeals procedure, (b) those awaiting a memorandum of understanding with an overseas country and (c) any others; and a further analysis showing how many of these applications were made to each of the self-regulatory organisations and to the Securities and Investments Board, respectively.

Mr. Redwood: At 21 March, a total of 98 businesses held interim authorisation:

	Interim authorisations
AFBD	7
FIMBRA	48
IMRO	7
TSA	34
SIB	2

The number subject to appeal is not available. Of the total, 10 applications to FIMBRA and 22 applicants to TSA are businesses incorporated abroad on which a decision is postponed awaiting entry into satisfactory arrangements with the regulatory authorities in the country of incorporation.

Financial Services Act

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any individuals as opposed to businesses are vetted when applications are made for authorisation under the Financial Services Act.

Mr. Redwood: This is a matter for the particular regulatory body to which a business makes application for authorisation. I understand that all the regulatory bodies vet individuals of significance to the shareholdings or management of the business when they consider application for authorisation of that business. Some self-regulatory organisations have membership requirements that go further.

Rover Sale

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the dates in 1988 and those present when the tax arrangements governing the sale of Rover were discussed.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 12 March 1990]: I understand that tax aspects of the sale of the Government shareholding in the Rover Group to British Aerospace were the principal subject discussed at the following meetings held in 1988:

Date	Organisations represented
29 February	DTI and Inland Revenue
8 March	DTI, Inland Revenue, Baring Brothers and Slaughter & May
10 March	Inland Revenue, Baring Brothers and Slaughter & May
24 March	DTI, Inland Revenue, British Aerospace, Slaughter & May, Peat Marwick McLintock and Linklaters & Paines
28 March	Inland Revenue, British Aerospace, Rover Group, Slaughter & May, Peat Marwick McLintock, Linklaters & Paines and Ashurst Morris Crisp
28 April	Inland Revenue and Slaughter & May
29 June	DTI, Inland Revenue, Her Majesty's Treasury, Rover Group, British Aerospace, Slaughter & May, Peat Marwick McLintock and Linklaters & Paines
6 July	DTI, Inland Revenue, British Aerospace, Slaughter & May, Linklaters & Paines, Peat Marwick McLintock

Footwear and Leather Goods

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what is the value of footwear and leather imports under the GSP scheme from Thailand into the United Kingdom since 1 January; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps the Government are taking to restore full duties where imports of shoes and leather goods have already exceeded the European Economic Community ceilings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 26 March 1990]: Footwear and leather goods enter the United Kingdom under a number of tariff headings and different categories are monitored differently, according to their treatment under the GSP. My Department has asked the European Commission to reimpose duty on footwear under tariff headings 6401 and 6402 from Thailand and Indonesia. The total value of imports from Thailand for tariff headings 6401 and 6402 from 1 January—14 March 1990 was 2,506,331 ecu. If the hon. Member requires figures for any other tariff headings, I should be happy to write to him.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Debt

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had concerning repealing the Payment of Debt (Northern Ireland) Act.

Mr. Cope: The Government keep the working of the Act under review. We also receive representations about the Act from time to time, including a recent letter from the hon. Gentleman.

Strangford Lough

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what date the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside met to give him advice about the proposed Strangford Lough (ASSI) (Part 3) declaration; and whether such advice given is in written form.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland was advised on nature conservation matters by the Committee for Nature Conservation (CNC) until 16 May 1989 when that committee (and the Ulster Countryside Committee) was replaced by the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside (CNCC).

On 20 November 1986 the CNC endorsed the Department's proposals for an area of special scientific interest (ASSI) at Strangford Lough. A revision to the proposed boundary was agreed by CNC at a meeting on 12

October 1987. The ASSI was declared in three parts, the third part, the Strangford Lough (Part 3) ASSI, being declared on 21 April 1989.

At a meeting on 7 July 1989 the CNCC endorsed the views of the CNC about the declaration of the ASSI. The views of the CNC and the CNCC were conveyed to the Department by means of copies of the minutes of their meetings.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he received prior advice from the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside before he confirmed the Strangford Lough (ASSI) (Part 3) declaration; and whether he made available to the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside information about objections from private individuals and public bodies to the proposed ASSI.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: At a meeting on 3 November 1989 the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside was informed by officials of the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland about the representations and objections to the declaration of the Strangford Lough (Part 3) area of special scientific interest (ASSI). The CNCC advised the officials of its support for the confirmation of the ASSI. The ASSI was confirmed on 16 November 1989.

Social Security Benefits

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for how long records of social security benefits paid to claimants are retained; and whether it is possible to obtain details of the period March 1985 to August 1987 relating to someone who qualified for and was in receipt of family income supplement in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: The length of time records of social security benefits paid to claimants are retained varies with the benefit and with certain other circumstances (for example, the death of a claimant). Records of family income supplement are normally retained for two years after the last date of payment and it is therefore unlikely that details of a claim relating to the period from March 1985 to August 1987 are available. However, if the hon. Gentleman has a particular case in mind my noble Friend —Lord Skelmersdale—will be pleased to look into it.
